¶ 245. In an action for malicious prosecution of an attachment suit, instructions that probable cause for the attachment would be such cause as the generality of careful business men would act upon under like circumstances; that plaintiffs' neglect to pay the debt or mere carelessness in the conduct of their business would not be sufficient to justify the belief that they were about to dispose of or conceal their property with intent to defraud their creditors; that probable cause to believe this must have been based on competent evidence; that, unless the jury found that defendants did have probable cause to believe that plaintiffs intended to do what the affidavit charged, there was no probable cause for suing out the writ; and that not only want of probable cause but malicious motives must be found,—held to contain nothing of which defendants could complain.—Brand v. Hinchman, 68 Mich. 590.

¶ 246. A charge erroneously stating that the attachment suit was terminated in the present plaintiff's favor is not prejudicial, plaintiff being entitled to maintain the action without such termination.—Brand v. Hinchman, 68 Mich. 590.

¶ 247. Where in an action for malicious prosecution of attachment, the facts upon which the defendant relied as a justification for suing out the writ did not establish probable cause, but the defendant relied upon the advice of counsel, it was error for the court in the charge to leave to the jury the question whether the facts established probable cause; as the court could not say that the jury did not rely upon that part of the charge in finding for the defendant, rather than upon the fact that the defendant relied upon advice of counsel.—Kompass v. Light, 122 Mich. 86.

MANDAMUS.

TREATS of the prerogative writ to compel a natural person or corporation or an inferior court to perform a duty legally incumbent on such person, corporation or court. It differs from contempt proceedings to punish one for disobedience or contumacy (see Contempt) and from injunctions to command one to refrain from action (see Injunctions).

I. GENERAL NATURE, GROUNDS AND PROPRIETY OF WRIT.

Original or appellate nature and office of writ, see post § 2.
Grounds and propriety of the writ, see post §§ 4-20, and see post II, III, IV.
Discretion and power or jurisdiction to issue writ, see post §§ 3, 123-125.
Nature of duties which may be compelled, see post §§ 16-19, and see post II, III, IV.
Trial of title to office, see post § 20.
Nature of duties which may be enforced by mandamus, see post § 16 et seq.
Other adequate legal remedy as primary recourse, see post § 13.
Office and function of writ to require judicial action, see post § 21.
Amenability of aggregate body of officers, e. g., city council, to mandamus, see post § 71.
Issues and matters triable in mandamus, see post § 154 et seq.
Impropriety of mandamus to reach question collaterally or indirectly, see post § 158.
Jurisdiction and power to issue the writ, see post § 123 et seq.
Proper parties to the action, see post §§ 126-132.
Procedure and relief, see post V.
Impropriety of alternative writ as compared with order to show cause, see post § 139.
Nature and terms of the order to show cause, see post § 140.
Terms and command of peremptory writ, see post § 172.
Retention of mandamus as form of action under Judicature Act, see Jud. Act, chap. XI, § 1; Comp. L. 1915, § 12350.

¶ 1. The history and nature of the writ of mandamus examined and expounded.—McBride v. Grand Rapids Common Council, 32 Mich. 360.

¶ 2. Mandamus is a prerogative writ designed to afford a summary and specific remedy where the party applying for it would otherwise be subjected to serious injustice.—Tawas & B. C. R. Co. v. Iosco Circuit Judge, 44 Mich. 479.

¶ 3. The primary purpose of the writ of mandamus is to enforce duties created by law.—Waterman-Waterbury Co. v. Cato Township School Dist. No. 4, 183 Mich. 168.

¶ 4. Mandamus proceedings are "civil actions" within the meaning of Pub. Acts 1905, No. 309, providing for a change of venue.—Woodworth v. Old Second Nat. Bank, 144 Mich. 338.

Scope and subjects of judicial review and compulsion, see post II.
Scope of review and matters considered, see post § 154 et seq.
Impropriety in mandamus to judge of trying merits of case whence his duty arose, see post § 159.
Impropriety of collateral review of judicial acts by mandamus to enforce duty founded thereon, see post § 160.
General supervisory powers of supreme court and circuit courts, see Courts §§ 52, 55.

¶ 6. Where a mandamus issues to direct the action of a legal tribunal, proceeding in the course of justice, it is an exercise of supervisory judicial control, and is in the exercise of appellate action. In other cases it is generally, if not always, in the nature of original action.—People ex rel. Barrett v. Bacon, 18 Mich. 247.

¶ 7. Mandamus to a township board is not an appellate proceeding wherein the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain refusal to approve sureties in a liquor bond can be reviewed.—Post v. Sparta Township Board, 64 Mich. 597.

Various factors influencing discretion, see post §§ 7-12.
Available and adequate other remedy as reason against writ, see post § 13.
Performance or offer in answer to perform as bar to writ, see post § 175.

Discretion to allow or deny order to show cause, see post § 139.
Discretion as to terms and extent of relief or command of peremptory writ, see post ¶ 980.
Impropriety of writ to control discretion of respondent, see post §§ 18, 28.

¶ 8. The writ, though a prerogative one, is demandable of right in a proper case, yet it is only to be granted in the exercise of a sound legal discretion.—People v. Regents of University of Michigan, 4 Mich. 98.

¶ 9. Mandamus is usually a discretionary writ, and is properly denied where its exercise is asked in a matter of policy rather than of right, and where there is no danger of evils serious enough to demand interference.—People ex rel. Board of Water Com'rs v. East Saginaw Common Council, 33 Mich. 164.

¶ 10. The writ of mandamus is discretionary, not of right, and is granted only to secure or protect substantial rights.—Pistorius v. Stempel, 81 Mich. 133; Schmedding v. May, 85 Mich. 1; Tennant v. Crocker, 85 Mich. 328; Township of Fruitport v. Muskegon Circuit Judge, 90 Mich. 20; McCreery v. Bay Circuit Judge, 93 Mich. 463; Elder v. Garner, 97 Mich. 617.

¶ 11. Mandamus will not be awarded in all cases even where a prima facie right to relief is shown, it being a discretionary one.—Tennant v. Crocker, 85 Mich. 328.

¶ 12. Mandamus is not a writ of right and will not be used on technical grounds to deprive a suitor of his day in court.—Durand v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 76 Mich. 624.

¶ 13. A mandamus, in a case where the duty of a public officer is absolute and specific to pay over public moneys, is no more matter of discretion than any other remedy.—Courts cannot refuse to enforce absolute rights.—Aplin, Auditor General v. Treasurer of Tuscola County, 73 Mich. 28.

¶ 14. The naked right to the writ of mandamus is not sufficient to warrant its issuance, and it will be denied where the public interest would be injuriously affected, or where there is a doubt of its propriety.—New York Mortg. Co. v. Secretary of State, 150 Mich. 197.

Existence and certainty of judicial duty, see post § 22 et seq.
Existence and certainty of administrative or official duty, see post § 75.
Duties resting in discretion of respondent, see post § 18.
Impropriety of mandamus to compel performance of duties of a continuing and indeterminate nature, see post § 17.
Necessity that respondent have power to perform command of writ, if issued, see post § 9.
Pendency of motion for same relief as bar to mandamus, see also post ¶ 139.
Necessity and sufficiency of allegations of duty in petition, see post § 135.
Existence and maturity of right in relator to performance of the duty, see post § 6.

¶ 15. Mandamus issues only to compel the recognition of a clean legal right or the performance of a legal duty; it does not issue so long as the right or the duty is disputed or doubtful.—People ex rel. Willing v. Jackson Circuit Judges, 1 D. 302; People ex rel. Bradley v. Branch Circuit Judges, 1 D. 319; People ex rel. Monroe v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 19 Mich. 296; People ex rel. Pack v. Presque Isle County Sup'rs, 36 Mich. 377; Peck v. Kent County Sup'rs, 47 Mich. 477; Post v. Sparta Township Board, 63 Mich. 323.

¶ 17. Mandamus to compel a village common council to commence proceedings to remove obstructions in an alleged public highway or street will be refused where the legality of the highway is contested in good faith by the person obstructing, where the relator has an ample remedy in equity if the facts alleged in his petition are true.—French v. Common Council of Village of South Haven, 85 Mich. 135.

¶ 18. Mandamus does not lie to enforce a disputed stipulation to settle a case, even though money has been paid thereunder. The parties to the stipulation are entitled to have the fact as to the settlement tried on a regular issue before a jury.—Leavitt v. Detroit Superior Court Judge, 52 Mich. 595.

¶ 19. It is exceedingly doubtful whether the question of title can be tried in a mandamus proceeding against the auditor general to cancel a tax deed, where the title of the relator to the land is in doubt.—Hanchett v. Auditor General, 124 Mich. 424.

General rule as to other pending action as ground for abatement, see Abatement § 10 et seq.

¶ 20. Where an appeal is pending in the supreme court from a decree of the circuit court in chancery dismissing appellant's bill to compel the auditor general to recall a certificate of error canceling a tax deed, such appellant cannot obtain a writ of mandamus commanding the vacation of the certificate upon the same grounds set up in the chancery suit, since, by issuing such writ, the court would have to determine, contrary to the rights insisted upon by the appellant in his suit pending, that the chancery court had no jurisdiction to grant him relief.—Smith v. Auditor General, 151 Mich. 622.

¶ 21. That an appeal is pending from the dismissal of a bill to enjoin city officers from holding a charter election, does not prevent the bringing of mandamus proceedings to compel such officers to hold such election.—Attorney General ex rel. Baum v. City of Saginaw, 177 Mich. 432.

¶ 22. A writ of mandamus to compel a supervisor to assess a drain tax should not be dismissed because of the pendency of an appeal from a decree dismissing the bill of complaint attacking the validity of the drain proceeding and dissolving a preliminary injunction against the collection of taxes.—Brown v. Nehmer, 128 Mich. 690.

¶ 23. A suit in chancery to enjoin the issue of bonds by a village in accordance with a vote of the electors, and the granting therein of a preliminary injunction, do not constitute a bar to a proceeding by mandamus to compel the village authorities to sign bonds voted at an election subsequently held, where it does not appear but that the injunction was granted because of some mere irregularity in the first election.—Daniels v. Long, 111 Mich. 562.

Want of exigency or beneficial occasion as reason for denying mandamus, see post § 7.

Necessity of payment or tender of amount due to mature right, see also post ¶ 455.

Sufficiency of relator's interest to entitle him, see post §§ 126-128.

Necessity and sufficiency of allegations in petition, see post § 135.

¶ 24. A mandamus will not be issued to compel a circuit judge to make an order, when such order is not necessary to perfect the right of the party applying for the writ.—People ex rel. Amperse v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 14 Mich. 33.

¶ 25. On mandamus to require dissolution it is not important whether the circuit court has jurisdiction to grant a temporary injunction restraining the board of election commissioners from printing on the ballots the name of a person who alleges that he was nominated to fill a vacancy in the office of county prosecuting attorney, unless it appears that some right of such person is involved or some legal duty of the board of election commissioners is interfered with.—Board Election Com'rs Wayne Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judges, 172 Mich. 430.

¶ 26. Mandamus will not lie to compel a county to pay ditch orders at the instance of one not clearly showing himself to have title thereto.—Brownell v. Gratiot County Sup'rs, 49 Mich. 414.

¶ 27. Since mandamus is not a writ of right but of discretion, it is rightly refused to compel a township clerk and supervisor to lay before the board of supervisors an assessment roll for a drain, where by demurring to the answer of the respondents relator admits that the drain is not yet completed and that therefore he is not yet entitled to payment of the order on which he founds his right.—Sherwood v. Rynearson, 141 Mich. 92.

¶ 28. Mandamus to compel payment to a contractor from a special assessment was denied where the assessment had been adjudged invalid in a suit brought by a taxpayer to recover back what he had paid so that it never went into the special fund to pay relator.—People ex rel. Gebhart v. City of East Saginaw, 40 Mich. 336.

¶ 29. An application for a mandamus to compel respondents to place the name of the relator upon the official ballot as a candidate for alderman is properly denied where it does not appear that the relator was selected by any assemblage or meeting of electors of his ward, but had simply announced himself as an independent candidate, giving only the right to write his name into the ballot in voting.—Chateau v. Jacobs, 88 Mich. 170.

¶ 30. Under How. St. § 745 providing that "one of the remaining justices" on being notified by any member of the township board shall meet with the board and have the same authority as the other members, in case there shall not be three members of the board able or competent to act, an application for a mandamus on behalf and by the third ranking justice of the peace to seat him on the board in case of disability will not lie, because the members of the board can call upon any justice to act temporarily as member of the board.—Grondin v. Logan, 88 Mich. 247.

¶ 31. If the writ of mandamus could be awarded at all to compel the registrar of deeds to permit a person to have access, so long and as far as it is found necessary, to the documents and files of his office, for the purpose of constructing a complete abstract of the titles of the real property in the county, it would be denied to a private foreign corporation where such corporation showed no authority from the state of its origin to deal in lands or land-titles.—Diamond Match Co. v. Powers, 51 Mich. 145.

¶ 32. The purchase of tax titles by the original owner having been only one method of paying his taxes and performing his duty to the state, and the tax titles, whether valid or invalid, having by such purchase become merged in the original title, a stranger could not by mandamus compel the cancellation of a tax deed for failure to pay all taxes.—Clippinger v. Auditor General, 135 Mich. 1.

¶ 33. A writ of mandamus will not issue to allow the inspection of corporate books and papers by a director whose term of office has expired pending certiorari to review the writ and who has not been re-elected, where he claims the right of inspection only in such capacity and not as a stockholder.—Leach v. Davy, 199 Mich. 378.

See also post ¶¶ 254, 293.

Denial of writ because of futility, see post §§ 8, 9.

Denial of writ because of unfairness, injustice, or misconduct, see post § 10.

Denial of writ tending to further illegality, see post § 11.

Discretion to deny writ in absence of exigency, see ante ¶ 9.

Substantial right as essential, see also ante ¶ 10.

Mandamus to correct record to show matter otherwise appearing of record, see post ¶ 369.

Useless questions in settlement of pleadings, see post § 32.

Necessity of mature right in relator to performance of the duty asserted, see ante § 6.

Delay and change of conditions as reason against writ, see post § 12.

Exigency or substantial occasion to correct injunctional orders, see post §§ 44, 45.

Declination of questions on hearing that have become immaterial, see post § 154 et seq.

Necessity and sufficiency of allegations in petition, see post § 135.

¶ 34. Mandamus is never issued unless to enforce a clear legal right, and in furtherance of justice; it will not issue to compel a judge to vacate an order striking out relator's plea, where the defense set up was waived a few days after the filing of the plea.—Electric Park Amusement Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 155 Mich. 640.

¶ 34a. Where, after the removal of a cause from the Wayne circuit court to the superior court of Detroit, a mandamus was applied for to require its dismissal for want of jurisdiction of the defendant's person on the ground that he was not a resident of Detroit, the application was denied on a showing that the defendant had moved for a continuance in the circuit court, and had thereby precluded himself from raising this question of jurisdiction.—People ex rel. Field v. Superior Court Judge, 30 Mich. 10.

¶ 35. Mandamus to compel the dissolution of a preliminary injunction was denied where such injunction, whether right or wrong, had spent its principal force; it being desirable to have the entire merits before the supreme court on appeal after final hearing below.—Mills v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 77 Mich. 210.

¶ 36. Mandamus to vacate an order setting aside an execution sale after time for redemption had passed was denied in the court's discretion.—Stinton v. Kent Circuit Judge, 87 Mich. 286; Wilkie v. Ingham County Circuit Judge, 52 Mich. 641.

¶ 37. The supreme court in the exercise of its discretion will not compel a circuit court to proceed with the trial of a case where the only outcome must be a judgment against the relator.—Hatch v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 138 Mich. 184.

¶ 38. A judge will not be compelled by mandamus to allow an amendment ineffective to accomplish what relator seeks.—Kilby Mfg. Co. v. Menominee Circuit Judge, 138 Mich. 277.

¶ 39. Mandamus will not issue to compel a circuit judge to frame an issue in a proceeding before him to compel the approval of a druggist's bond, where it appears that before the hearing on such bond, three of the four sureties thereto withdrew from it; since, at the time such mandamus was heard, there was no proper bond before the court to be passed upon.—Young v. Van Buren Circuit Judge, 145 Mich. 341.

¶ 40. While a defendant cannot withdraw his demurrer and plead over without leave of court, the refusal of the court to hear the demurrer upon the ground that a plea had been filed is equivalent to the granting of such leave nunc pro tunc and the circuit judge having made return that in his discretion no costs should be allowed, mandamus will be denied to compel him to enter judgment on the demurrer.—Fisher v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 128 Mich. 543.

¶ 41. Mandamus will not issue to compel a circuit court judge to set aside an order continuing a cause for a term where at the time of respondent's return to the writ and final submission of the proceeding to the supreme court and the circuit court term at which the order was made has passed.—Palmer-Stevenson Const. Co. v. Mason Circuit Judge, 176 Mich. 326.

¶ 42. Relator moved the respondent judge to transfer a case to another county on the ground of local prejudice. The return of the judge disputed the existence of such prejudice. Held, the upper court would not on mandamus delay the trial in the circuit court in order to settle this issue of fact, where the defendant had waived any right he might have to such mandamus proceeding by asking that the case be set down on a day certain for trial.—Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Cheboygan Circuit Judge, 159 Mich. 210.

¶ 43. A writ of mandamus will not issue on petition of executors to compel a circuit judge to set aside an order in chancery restraining executors from turning over certain moneys to a legatee and ordering the legatee to pay to complainant unpaid allimony for support of his children where the legatee does not appear to contest the proceedings and does not attempt to excuse his conduct.—Craig v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 192 Mich. 106.

Want of exigency or beneficial occasion as reason against writ, see ante § 7.

Denial because of want of power to obey or perform, see post § 9.

¶ 44. Mandamus to compel a county clerk to issue a certificate of election to a person shown by the returns to have been legally elected was denied when it would not have given substantial relief, and the question might be raised again in an issue as to the accuracy of the returns or by proceedings in the nature of quo warranto.—Sherburne v. Horn, 45 Mich. 160.

¶ 45. Mandamus will not issue to compel the board of state canvassers, which refuses to credit a candidate at a general election with the votes cast for him in certain counties because his name is spelled incorrectly in the returns, to obtain corrected returns, and canvass the votes in accordance therewith, if the general result is such that the action would be an idle ceremony affecting no material rights or interests.—Baker v. Board of State Canvassers, 111 Mich. 278.

¶ 46. A court is not required to issue a mandamus where its effect would be of no avail.—Fuchs v. Common Council Village of Grass Lake, 166 Mich. 569.

¶ 47. Mandamus will not lie to compel a duty under a law which duty is merely preliminary to the main purpose of the law, and which purpose the law provides no means of accomplishing.—Attorney General v. Lawton, 80 Mich. 386.

¶ 48. Where a condition attached to an approval by the common council of a street railway company's poles is inoperative and void, and where the council has already approved the pattern of the poles as required by the ordinance, mandamus will not be granted, because of the void condition, to compel the council to approve the poles over again.—Electric R. Co. of Grand Rapids v. Common Council of Grand Rapids, 84 Mich. 257.

¶ 49. Where the presiding officer of a city common council declared the adoption on a majority vote of a resolution which under the charter required a two-thirds vote of all the aldermen elect, a mandamus to compel him to reverse his decision and to declare the resolution lost was denied on the ground that it appeared from the face of the records that the resolution was not legally carried, because all persons are chargeable with notice of the illegality.—Tennant v. Crocker, 85 Mich. 328.

Injunction against further proceedings in case as bar to mandamus to proceed to hearing, see post ¶ 225.

¶ 50. Mandamus will not be issued unless it clearly appears that the person to whom it is directed has the absolute power to execute it.—Turnbull v. Giddings, 95 Mich. 314; City of Benton Harbor v. St. Joseph & B. H. St. R. Co., 102 Mich. 386.

¶ 51. Mandamus will not lie where respondent has no power to obey its mandate.—Corby v. Wayne Probate Judge, 96 Mich. 11.

¶ 52. The writ of mandamus is a discretionary writ, and it must clearly appear that the party to whom it is directed has the power to execute it; otherwise, it will not be issued.—Fuchs v. Common Council Village of Grass Lake, 166 Mich. 569.

¶ 53. Mandamus will not lie to compel a circuit judge to overrule his finding that the proceedings taken for the condemnation of a site for a schoolhouse were irregular, and to compel him to enter judgment for the amount found due against the district.—Delhi School Dist. No. 5 v. Ingham Circuit Judge, 49 Mich. 432.

¶ 54. Where, in a proceeding by a state and under a state law to condemn lands for the purposes of the general government, the state abandons the proceeding before its completion, and the owner of the lands applies for a mandamus to compel it to be carried through, the question of the state power is necessarily involved. Such a condemnation might be effectual if the general government has accepted the land, and the owner had received the compensation awarded, for a statute may transfer title in any form the parties mutually assent to, but until the assent of both is signified the proceeding must be wholly inoperative.—People ex rel. Trombley v. Humphrey, 23 Mich. 471.

¶ 55. Mandamus will not lie against the board of assessors to strike an improper tax assessment from the rolls, where the writ would be unavailing by reason of the fact that the rolls would at the time of its issuance be out of the hands of the assessors, and in the custody of the collectors.—W. A. Sturgeon & Co. v. Board Assessors City of Detroit, 159 Mich. 199.

Denial of writ to aid or further illegality, see post § 11.

Delay and laches affecting propriety of issuance, see post § 12.

¶ 56. The issuance of a writ of mandamus is not a matter of right, but is a matter of discretion, and should be issued only where it appears that justice requires it.—MacKinnon v. Auditor General, 130 Mich. 552; Grand Rapids & I. Ry. Co. v. Auditor General, 144 Mich. 77.

¶ 57. Mandamus will be allowed only in furtherance of justice upon a proper case presented. It will not be allowed where it is apparent that it is applied for to gratify the spite of a private individual, or where the relator has instigated, authorized or approved the act complained of.—Hale v. Risley, 69 Mich. 596.

¶ 58. The writ of mandamus is a discretionary writ, and will not be issued when inconsistent with justice.—Wooster v. Calhoun Circuit Judge, 150 Mich. 459.

¶ 59. Mandamus is a discretionary writ, and should not issue where it works an injustice.—Craig v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 192 Mich. 106.

¶ 60. The rule that mandamus is not a writ of right and will only be allowed in the furtherance of justice upon a proper case presented, and will not be granted to accomplish an illegal purpose though the officer against whom it is invoked is charged with an express statutory duty, is as applicable to the circuit court as to the supreme court.—Cook v. Board Election Com'rs Cheboygan Co., 172 Mich. 437; George N. Fletcher & Sons v. Alpena Circuit Judge, 136 Mich. 511.

¶ 62. This writ is discretionary, and should always be refused where the record shows the injustice of relator's claim.—Van Akin v. Dunn, 117 Mich. 421.

¶ 63. The writ of mandamus is discretionary, hence the plea of the statute of limitations may be entertained and the writ refused, where the answer shows that the claim (upon a contingent county order) is fraudulent, and relator does not ask for the trial of an issue.—Merrill v. Gladwin County Treasurer, 61 Mich. 95.

¶ 64. Because his demand is inequitable and unjust, a holder of a city warrant issued to pay for street improvements cannot have a mandamus to compel the city to pay it out of the fund derived from a tax levied for that purpose, but which assessment the relator in another action had succeeded in having declared illegal.—Mason v. City of Gladstone, 93 Mich. 232.

¶ 65. The court in its discretion may refuse the writ altogether unless the party seeking it consents to do equity.—Stevens v. Saginaw County Sup'rs, 62 Mich. 579.

¶ 66. The writ of mandamus is discretionary, and those who invoke its aid must come into court with clean hands; it cannot be invoked to accomplish a purpose confessedly illegal, even though the officer against whom it is invoked is charged with an express duty under the statute.—Board of Supervisors of Cheboygan County v. Supervisor of Township of Mentor, 94 Mich. 386.

¶ 67. Relator railroad company repeatedly promised the city to build a bridge over a street which it crossed. Assurances were thus made during a number of years; no defense was made to proceedings to compel it; and defendant was in contempt for failing to obey the order of the circuit judge to build the bridge. Held, the relator was not in a position to ask the grace of the court to issue a writ of mandamus to vacate the order of the circuit judge.—Chicago, D. & C. G. T. Junct. R. Co. v. St. Clair Circuit Judge, 156 Mich. 567.

Invalidity in or objection to claim against the public as bar to mandamus to compel payment, see post § 95.

¶ 68. Mandamus will not be issued to aid in enforcement of an illegal claim.—Detroit Board of Education v. Detroit Common Council, 80 Mich. 548.

¶ 69. Mandamus to compel the common council of Detroit to order the issuing of bonds to purchase lands for a park contracted for by the board of park commissioners was denied as encroaching on the constitutional rights and functions of the city.—People ex rel. Detroit Park Com'rs v. Detroit Common Council, 28 Mich. 228.

¶ 70. Mandamus on the relation of a board of supervisors will not lie to compel individual supervisors who have opposed a fraudulent vote of money by the board to spread on their respective assessment rolls their proportion of the fraudulent tax.—Board of Supervisors of Cheboygan County v. Supervisor of Township of Mentor, 94 Mich. 386.

¶ 71. In mandamus proceedings against a municipal officer to compel the execution of certain bonds of the municipality, respondent may set up the illegality of the election by which the issue of such bonds was provided for.—Daniels v. Long, 111 Mich. 562.

¶ 72. Where one's unfitness for an official position from which he has been summarily removed is conceded, he cannot invoke the aid of the discretionary writ of mandamus to exact payment of salary for a period succeeding his discharge, even though his removal may have been illegal because without opportunity for hearing and defense.—McQueen v. Detroit Common Council of Detroit, 116 Mich. 90.

¶ 73. The Detroit controller could not be compelled by mandamus to draw a warrant for the salary of a clerk, where the city board of estimates had stricken out the item in question from the estimate of expenses for the office of the city board of assessors, nor could he be compelled to pay such items from other sources than taxation. (Following Robinson v. Detroit, 107 Mich. 168.)—City of Detroit v. Blades, 133 Mich. 249.

¶ 74. Where a village ordinance forbids the keeping of saloons or saloon bars or the sale of liquor in saloons or bars, mandamus will not lie to force the council to issue a license to sell liquor at a hotel bar.—Boos v. Scudder, 163 Mich. 678.

¶ 75. On April 20, 1911, a village council passed an ordinance prohibiting saloons, to be effective on May 10, 1911. On April 22, 1911, relator filed a petition and bond for a saloon license, which petition was rejected by the council on May 4, 1911. On May 8, 1911, relator presented a petition to the circuit court praying that a mandamus should issue requiring said council to meet within a reasonable time for the purpose of considering and acting upon the application of relator and to require said council to approve same. The hearing on said petition was held on May 22d. Held, mandamus was properly refused.—Fuchs v. Common Council Village of Grass Lake, 166 Mich. 569.

¶ 76. A writ of mandamus to compel a village council to issue relator a saloon license will not be denied on the ground that the result will be to give the village four saloons instead of the three lawfully allowed, where said relator is not responsible for the unlawful action of the council in producing that result.—Rhode v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 168 Mich. 683. (Moore, C. J., dissenting.)

Denial of writ to enforce payment of barred claim, see also ante ¶ 63.

Laches and delay as bar to mandamus to judicial officers, see post § 23.

¶ 77. Mandamus is not a writ of right, and is not usually allowed to those who have been culpably dilatory or otherwise at fault.—People ex rel. Mabley v. Detroit Superior Judge, 41 Mich. 31.

¶ 78. Where the statute of limitations is interposed to prevent the payment of a just claim, the court may refuse to permit the plea to interfere with issuing the writ when the period has been less than ten years.—Merrill v. Gladwin County Treasurer, 61 Mich. 95; County of Oceana v. Hart Township Sup'rs, 48 Mich. 319.

¶ 79. Mandamus being a discretionary writ will not issue when inconsistent with justice, and though it is a legal process it is governed by equitable principles and will not lie when legal redress is barred by the statute of limitations.—McRae v. Auditor General, 146 Mich. 594.

¶ 80. Mandamus is a discretionary writ, partaking of the nature of a bill in equity for specific performance, wherein stale claims are not favored.—Yeomans v. Board Sup'rs Ionia Co., 174 Mich. 451.

¶ 81. Mandamus proceedings for the purpose of collecting a debt are not different from any other suits, and are barred by laches, the bar following by analogy the statute of limitations.—Yeomans v. Board Sup'rs Ionia Co., 174 Mich. 451.

¶ 82. Mandamus to compel the quartermaster-general to receive a claim for a state bounty, provided for by act 27 of 1865, and under § 1 of act 132 of 1871 to examine and allow the claim and forward a certificate to the auditor-general, was denied in 1881 for laches.—Blanchard v. Church, 47 Mich. 644.

¶ 83. A delay for more than six years to demand payment of township and highway orders, or to apply for mandamus to compel such payment, if unexplained, will bar relief by such writ.—Avery v. Township Board of Township of Krakow, 73 Mich. 622.

¶ 84. Mandamus was not allowed to enforce the payment of a claim for salary as a city officer where the relator first elected to sue in assumpsit, but left the action undetermined, and, after ten years had passed from the date of his claim, sought his remedy by mandamus from the supreme court.—Walcott v. City of Jackson, 51 Mich. 249.

¶ 85. Mandamus having been determined to be the appropriate remedy to enforce payment of a claim against a county, it was not defeated on the ground of laches, where the statute of limitations had not run against the claim.—Hanna v. Chalker, 136 Mich. 8.

¶ 86. Mandamus being a discretionary writ, its issue to compel the payment of a county order will be refused, when the answer sets up the plea of the statute of limitations, and also shows that the claim is fraudulent, and the relator does not ask for the trial of an issue to determine the fact of fraud.—Merrill v. Gladwin County Treasurer, 61 Mich. 95.

¶ 87. Where a complainant has failed to enforce a claim against a county for nearly eight years, he having officially come in possession of all the facts in connection therewith, his laches will bar a writ of mandamus.—Yeomans v. Board Sup'rs Ionia Co., 174 Mich. 451.

¶ 88. Mandamus to compel the placing of certain property on an assessment roll is denied when applied for so late as to deprive the parties of the right to have the assessment reviewed.—Maurer v. Cliff, 94 Mich. 194.

¶ 89. A county treasurer cannot be compelled by mandamus to issue tax-deeds for lands purchased by relator under § 80 of the tax-law of 1891, where it appears that before the writ was applied for, relator accepted a tender by respondent of the purchase-money, and that before tender back the lands were conveyed to others.—Aitcheson v. Huebner, 90 Mich. 648.

¶ 90. Mandamus proceedings to compel the auditor general to refund the amount paid at an invalid tax sale must fail where the petitioner has waited for fourteen years before bringing such suit, the state having the right in such proceedings to invoke the statute of limitations.—Wilkinson v. Auditor General, 147 Mich. 13.

¶ 91. A delay of fifteen years by the holder of drain orders in seeking by mandamus to compel the reassessment of a tax where a previous assessment had been set aside for irregularities, is sufficient to bar relief, where such remedy was available from the time he acquired the orders.—McDermott v. Alger, 186 Mich. 278.

¶ 92. Mandamus is granted to compel the board of education of the city of Detroit to rescind a resolution reconsidering one passed at a former meeting adopting a text-book for use in place of one which had been in use for upwards of five years, and making a different selection; it appearing that in the interim the publishers of the book first adopted, and the patrons of the school, had acted in reliance upon the rescinded resolution in the sale and purchase of books.—Jones v. Board of Education of City of Detroit, 88 Mich. 371.

¶ 93. Although the charter and ordinances of a city require the official printing to be done in a newspaper published in such city, a local publisher whose bid has been rejected cannot compel the city, by mandamus, to award him the contract, after it has been let to outside parties and partly performed.—Clark v. Mayor of West Bay City, 112 Mich. 283.

¶ 94. Where, pending proceedings to compel the common council of a city to approve a paving contract made with the relator by the board of public works, the contract is let to another party, and the work done, mandamus will be denied, and the relator left to his action against the city.—Talbot Paving Co. v. Common Council of City of Detroit, 91 Mich. 262.

Ionia Circuit Judge, 136 Mich. 274; Hartz v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 164 Mich. 231.

¶ 96. Mandamus will not be awarded in cases where another remedy is provided by law.—People ex rel. Drew v. Washtenaw Circuit Judges, 1 D. 434.

¶ 97. Mandamus is not a writ of right, and will not lie, as a general rule, when the law has provided another remedy.—Trumbull Motor Car Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 189 Mich. 554.

¶ 98. Mandamus is not to be resorted to when there is a plain, direct, and adequate remedy at law.—Coffin v. Board of Education of Detroit, 114 Mich. 342.

¶ 99. Mandamus is the proper remedy for enforcing a specific legal right for which there is no other adequate legal remedy, and it is not excluded by other legal remedies which are not adequate to secure the specific relief needed, nor by the existence of a specific remedy in equity.—People ex rel. La Grange Township v. State Treasurer, 24 Mich. 468.

¶ 100. Mandamus may issue where other remedies exist, if they are not sufficiently speedy to prevent material injury.—Tawas & B. C. R. Co. v. Iosco Circuit Judge, 44 Mich. 479.

¶ 101. Remedy by mandamus is not precluded by the fact that the respondent may be liable as for a misdemeanor in wilfully neglecting his duty; a criminal prosecution will not secure its performance, and specific compliance can be enforced only by mandamus.—People ex rel. Ayres v. State Board of Auditors, 42 Mich. 422.

¶ 102. While the writ of mandamus has been treated as in its nature discretionary and prerogative, and not necessarily limited by strict rules to cases involving positive statutory duties, or in which there is an entire absence of any other remedy, yet it has been frequently said that the writ will not be granted where there is another adequate remedy.—Waterman-Waterbury Co. v. Cato Township School Dist. No. 4, 188 Mich. 168.

¶ 103. Mandamus asked by the board of water commissioners of East Saginaw to compel the common council to levy a tax to pay bonds issued by the board, and about to mature, was denied, as the board had a remedy, by issuing new bonds, to meet the old ones.—People ex rel. Board of Water Com'rs v. East Saginaw Common Council, 33 Mich. 164.

¶ 104. The police justice of Grand Rapids has no authority to proceed against the supervisors of the county by mandamus to compel them to audit and allow to the city the fees charged by the act creating the police court, upon the county, in cases tried before him; the act being construed to require him to collect the costs imposed by him upon individuals, but not such as were payable by the county to the city, under the same.—People ex rel. McBride v. Kent County Sup'rs, 38 Mich. 421.

¶ 105. Mandamus, not injunction, is the proper remedy where nothing remains but the enforcement of a legal duty on a public officer's part.—Webster v. Newell, 66 Mich. 503.

¶ 106. Bill in equity, and not mandamus, is the proper remedy to restrain a city council from wrongfully submitting to a vote of the electorate a proposed amendment to the city charter.—Attorney General ex rel. Hudson v. Common Council City of Detroit, 164 Mich. 369. (Ostrander, C. J., and McAlvay and Blair, JJ., dissenting.)

¶ 107. The fact that there is a specific remedy in equity does not necessarily oust the jurisdiction of a common-law court in mandamus, but only appeals to its discretion, which may be exercised where the circumstances call for prompt interference by the courts.—Tawas & B. C. R. Co. v. Iosco Circuit Judge, 44 Mich. 479.

¶ 108. Mandamus against the proper officers to compel the levy and collection of the tax as provided by law is the remedy of the seller of road machinery to the road commissioners, to recover the price thereof, under Comp. L. 1897, §§ 4193-4197, which authorizes commissioners of highways in townships to purchase tools and machinery for making roads, and provides for a highway tax to raise funds for the payment therefor, and assumpsit against such township will not lie; since the township is not primarily liable, no contract relations existing between it and the seller of such machines; and the road districts in such townships, which through such commissioners purchased such machines, are not municipalities, which can assume obligations and sue and be sued.—Pape v. Township of Benton, 140 Mich. 165.

¶ 110. Mandamus does not lie to enforce a contract; as where the relator is a bank, seeking to compel the respondent, an officer of a public board, to deposit with it, as required by law, funds to the custody of which it is entitled under a bid made therefor to the board.—Port Huron Board of Education v. Runnels, 57 Mich. 46.

¶ 111. The remedy by mandamus is not adapted to cases calling for continuous action, varying according to circumstances.—Diamond Match Co. v. Powers, 51 Mich. 145.

To control or review judicial discretion, see post § 28.

¶ 112. Mandamus lies only to enforce strict legal rights, and will not be granted to enforce the doing of an act which by law lies in the discretion of the officer refusing to do it.—People ex rel. Houghton County v. Auditor General, 36 Mich. 271.

¶ 113. The writ is granted to compel the performance of a ministerial act, but not to inquire into the proper exercise of judicial discretion.—People ex rel. Sweet v. Adam, 3 Mich. 427.

Compellable private duties, see post § 110 et seq.

Ingham County Treasurer, 36 Mich. 416; Moiles v. Watson, 60 Mich. 415; Tallmadge Township School Dist. No. 8 v. Root, 61 Mich. 373; Frey v. Michie, 68 Mich. 323.

¶ 117. Respondent, running for the office of supervisor, demanded a recount by the board of canvassers, and upon their decision in his favor took the oath and entered upon the duties of the office. Held, mandamus proceedings begun by a rival candidate thereafter were not the proper remedy to try respondent's title to the office.—Miner v. Beurmann, 165 Mich. 672.

¶ 118. This writ is not the proper proceeding to oust one who is in the exercise of official duties, especially when he is not a party to the proceedings.—Pariseau v. Board of Education of Escanaba, 96 Mich. 302.

¶ 119. Mandamus to compel performance of official duty is not the proper method of trying the title to an office the de facto incumbent of which is not made a party to the proceeding.—Keeler v. Deo, 117 Mich. 1.

¶ 120. Although title to office will not usually be settled upon an application for mandamus, yet where the public interest demands it, and where a person in office de jure et de facto is interfered with by one whose lack of title is plain, it is proper to settle the question by mandamus.—Lawrence v. Hanley, 84 Mich. 399.

¶ 121. When the necessity is pressing and one entitled to hold office is an officer de facto as well as de jure, the court may determine his right thereto in a mandamus proceeding.—Lichtig v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 180 Mich. 667.

¶ 122. Mandamus was not the proper remedy to compel an actual incumbent of the office of secretary of a village school board to turn over to another claimant to the office, the books and papers pertaining to such office; where respondent claimed to be the secretary and denied the title of the relator not only to the office of secretary but also to the office of trustee.—Ashwell v. Bullock, 122 Mich. 620.

¶ 123. The title of a town supervisor, prima facie entitled to the office and claiming to have been duly appointed and to be entitled to the books pertaining to the office, will not be tried in mandamus proceedings.—Pipper v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 122 Mich. 688.

¶ 124. Mandamus will not try the question of corporate existence.—People ex rel. Chapman v. State Land Office Com'r, 26 Mich. 146.

¶ 125. Mandamus is not a proper remedy to determine the boundaries of the franchises of two municipal boards, claiming the same power of appointment.—Frey v. Michie, 68 Mich. 323.

II. COMPULSION OF JUDICIAL DUTIES AND REVIEW OF PROCEEDINGS.

Appellate or original character of mandamus, see ante § 2.

Extent of power to issue mandamus in supervisory control of lower tribunals, see Courts § 55.

Necessity of duty and clear legal right to performance and of exigency and beneficial occasion, see ante §§ 4-7.

Futility of writ as reason against allowance, see ante §§ 8, 9.

Impolicy, injustice, misconduct, unfairness and delay as barring issuance, see ante §§ 10-12.

Motion or request for action to fix duty, see post § 22.
Laches or other delay as bar to relief, see post § 23.
Other remedy as primary recourse, see post §§ 24-27.
Review of discretion or decisions of fact, see post §§ 28, 29.
Particular acts and proceedings compellable or reviewable, see post §§ 30-68.
Sufficiency of relator's interest, see post §§ 126-128.
Scope of review and matters considered, see post § 154 et seq.
Procedure for issuance of the writ and procedure on the writ, see post V.

¶ 126. A mandamus is allowed only to set the inferior jurisdiction in motion; but not for the purpose of requiring it to come to any particular conclusion, or of retracing its steps where it has already acted; and this notwithstanding the party has no other remedy.—People ex rel. Brower v. Wayne County Judge, 1 Mich. 359.

¶ 127. Mandamus is a proper process for setting a court in motion, but not for reviewing its affirmative judicial action, if there is any other effectual remedy.—Lloyd v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 56 Mich. 286.

¶ 128. The supreme court may, by mandamus, compel a judicial officer to proceed, hear, and decide, but can neither dictate his determination in advance nor review it after it is made by that writ.—Lyle v. Cass Circuit Judge, 157 Mich. 38.

¶ 129. Although mandamus will lie to compel a circuit judge to sign a decree upon his refusal to sign any decree, it will not lie to compel the signing of a particular decree.—Ambos v. Ingham Circuit Judge, 123 Mich. 618.

See also post ¶ 278.
Necessity of payment or tender to mature right, see also post ¶ 455.
Necessity of notice to fix duty to settle bill of exceptions, see post ¶ 399.
Necessity and sufficiency of allegations in petition, see post § 136.
Sufficiency of the record to show breach of duty, see post § 161 et seq.
Declination of questions not presented to or considered by respondent judge, see post § 156.
Denial of writ without further inquiry for want of previous motion to respondent, see post ¶ 994.
Statutory provision dispensing with motion to vacate order made on hearing, see Jud. Act, chap. XXXVI, § 2; Comp. L. 1915, § 13438.

¶ 130. The writ will not be granted where the application is for something different from that for which the party has laid the foundation. The refusal of the circuit court to grant a motion for an assessment of damages in replevin is not a proper foundation for an application to the supreme court for a mandamus commanding the circuit court to impanel a jury to assess the value of the property replevied.—People ex rel. Willing v. Jackson Circuit Judges, 1 D. 302.

¶ 131. A party to a cause is not entitled to mandamus to compel a circuit judge to file certain findings of law and fact, where he has neither made application to frame the issues to be tried by the court nor given the other party opportunity to prepare to meet them.—Caille Bros. Co. v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 155 Mich. 480.

¶ 132. Where no application to the trial court to vacate an order has been made mandamus will not issue to compel it to be done.—Swarthout v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 99 Mich. 347.

¶ 133. A writ of mandamus to set aside an order of a circuit judge may be properly denied where no application was made to the trial court to set aside the order complained of.—Mesler v. Jackson Circuit Judge, 188 Mich. 195.

¶ 134. Mandamus commanding the circuit court to set aside an order setting aside an order of default and an order of reference will be denied by this court where the relator has made no motion before the circuit court to vacate the order made.—Aitken v. Chippewa Circuit Judge, 146 Mich. 129.

¶ 135. It is not proper to bring mandamus to vacate an order of the circuit court granting a change of venue unless application therefor is first made to the circuit judge.—Freud v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 131 Mich. 606.

¶ 136. A motion to dissolve a temporary injunction is a formal prerequisite to an application for a mandamus to compel the vacating of the same.—Blain v. Chippewa Circuit Judge, 145 Mich. 59.

¶ 137. On a bill in chancery to avoid deeds obtained by defendant railroad company for a right of way, the court decreed that the deeds were void, but, as defendant had entered upon the land in good faith believing it had title, ordered that defendant should be enjoined from going on the premises or continuing its work unless it should deposit with the register a sum sufficient to cover any prospective award of damages to be made in condemnation proceedings to be begun within twenty days, and that in case of failure to make such deposit or to take such proceedings within the time, the case should be heard on four days' notice. On failure to agree as to the amount to be deposited, a reference was had, defendant examined witnesses, and at its motion the court fixed the sum. Complainant then applied to

¶ 33. A writ of mandamus will not issue to allow the inspection of corporate books and papers by a director whose term of office has expired pending certiorari to review the writ and who has not been re-elected, where he claims the right of inspection only in such capacity and not as a stockholder.—Leach v. Davy, 199 Mich. 378.

See also post ¶¶ 254, 293.
Denial of writ because of futility, see post §§ 8, 9.
Denial of writ because of unfairness, injustice, or misconduct, see post § 10.
Denial of writ tending to further illegality, see post § 11.
Discretion to deny writ in absence of exigency, see ante ¶ 9.
Substantial right as essential, see also ante ¶ 10.
Mandamus to correct record to show matter otherwise appearing of record, see post ¶ 369.
Useless questions in settlement of pleadings, see post § 82.
Necessity of mature right in relator to performance of the duty asserted, see ante § 6.
Delay and change of conditions as reason against writ, see post § 12.
Exigency or substantial occasion to correct injunctional orders, see post §§ 44, 45.
Declination of questions on hearing that have become immaterial, see post § 154 et seq.
Necessity and sufficiency of allegations in petition, see post § 135.

¶ 34. Mandamus is never issued unless to enforce a clear legal right, and in furtherance of justice; it will not issue to compel a judge to vacate an order striking out relator's plea, where the defense set up was waived a few days after the filing of the plea.—Electric Park Amusement Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 155 Mich. 640.

¶ 34a. Where, after the removal of a cause from the Wayne circuit court to the superior court of Detroit, a mandamus was applied for to require its dismissal for want of jurisdiction of the defendant's person on the ground that he was not a resident of Detroit, the application was denied on a showing that the defendant had moved for a continuance in the circuit court, and had thereby precluded himself from raising this question of jurisdiction.—People ex rel. Field v. Superior Court Judge, 30 Mich. 10.

¶ 35. Mandamus to compel the dissolution of a preliminary injunction was denied where such injunction, whether right or wrong, had spent its principal force; it being desirable to have the entire merits before the supreme court on appeal after final hearing below.—Mills v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 77 Mich. 210.

¶ 36. Mandamus to vacate an order setting aside an execution sale after time for redemption had passed was denied in the court's discretion.—Stinton v. Kent Circuit Judge, 87 Mich. 286; Wilkie v. Ingham County Circuit Judge, 52 Mich. 641.

¶ 37. The supreme court in the exercise of its discretion will not compel a circuit court to proceed with the trial of a case where the only outcome must be a judgment against the relator.—Hatch v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 138 Mich. 184.

¶ 38. A judge will not be compelled by mandamus to allow an amendment ineffective to accomplish what relator seeks.—Kilby Mfg. Co. v. Menominee Circuit Judge, 138 Mich. 277.

¶ 39. Mandamus will not issue to compel a circuit judge to frame an issue in a proceeding before him to compel the approval of a druggist's bond, where it appears that before the hearing on such bond, three of the four sureties thereto withdrew from it; since, at the time such mandamus was heard, there was no proper bond before the court to be passed upon.—Young v. Van Buren Circuit Judge, 145 Mich. 341.

¶ 40. While a defendant cannot withdraw his demurrer and plead over without leave of court, the refusal of the court to hear the demurrer upon the ground that a plea had been filed is equivalent to the granting of such leave nunc pro tunc and the circuit judge having made return that in his discretion no costs should be allowed, mandamus will be denied to compel him to enter judgment on the demurrer.—Fisher v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 128 Mich. 543.

¶ 41. Mandamus will not issue to compel a circuit court judge to set aside an order continuing a cause for a term where at the time of respondent's return to the writ and final submission of the proceeding to the supreme court and the circuit court term at which the order was made has passed.—Palmer-Stevenson Const. Co. v. Mason Circuit Judge, 176 Mich. 326.

¶ 42. Relator moved the respondent judge to transfer a case to another county on the ground of local prejudice. The return of the judge disputed the existence of such prejudice. Held, the upper court would not on mandamus delay the trial in the circuit court in order to settle this issue of fact, where the defendant had waived any right he might have to such mandamus proceeding by asking that the case be set down on a day certain for trial.—Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Cheboygan Circuit Judge, 159 Mich. 210.

¶ 43. A writ of mandamus will not issue on petition of executors to compel a circuit judge to set aside an order in chancery restraining executors from turning over certain moneys to a legatee and ordering the legatee to pay to complainant unpaid alimony for support of his children where the legatee does not appear to contest the proceedings and does not attempt to excuse his conduct.—Craig v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 192 Mich. 106.

Want of exigency or beneficial occasion as reason against writ, see ante § 7.

Denial because of want of power to obey or perform, see post § 9.

¶ 44. Mandamus to compel a county clerk to issue a certificate of election to a person shown by the returns to have been legally elected was denied when it would not have given substantial relief, and the question might be raised again in an issue as to the accuracy of the returns or by proceedings in the nature of quo warranto.—Sherburne v. Horn, 45 Mich. 160.

¶ 45. Mandamus will not issue to compel the board of state canvassers, which refuses to credit a candidate at a general election with the votes cast for him in certain counties because his name is spelled incorrectly in the returns, to obtain corrected returns and canvass the votes in accordance therewith, if the general result is such that the action would be an idle ceremony affecting no material rights or interests.—Baker v. Board of State Canvassers, 111 Mich. 378.

¶ 46. A court is not required to issue a mandamus where its effect would be of no avail.—Fuchs v. Common Council Village of Grass Lake, 166 Mich. 569.

¶ 47. Mandamus will not lie to compel a duty under a law which duty is merely preliminary to the main purpose of the law, and which purpose the law provides no means of accomplishing.—Attorney General v. Lawton, 80 Mich. 386.

¶ 48. Where a condition attached to an approval by the common council of a street railway company's poles is inoperative and void, and where the council has already approved the pattern of the poles as required by the ordinance, mandamus will not be granted, because of the void condition, to compel the council to approve the poles over again.—Electric R. Co. of Grand Rapids v. Common Council of Grand Rapids, 84 Mich. 257.

¶ 49. Where the presiding officer of a city common council declared the adoption on a majority vote of a resolution which under the charter required a two-thirds vote of all the aldermen elect, a mandamus to compel him to reverse his decision and to declare the resolution lost was denied on the ground that it appeared from the face of the records that the resolution was not legally carried, because all persons are chargeable with notice of the illegality.—Tennant v. Crocker, 85 Mich. 328.

Injunction against further proceedings in case as bar to mandamus to proceed to hearing, see post ¶ 225.

¶ 50. Mandamus will not be issued unless it clearly appears that the person to whom it is directed has the absolute power to execute it.—Turnbull v. Giddings, 95 Mich. 314; City of Benton Harbor v. St. Joseph & B. H. St. R. Co., 102 Mich. 386.

¶ 51. Mandamus will not lie where respondent has no power to obey its mandate.—Corby v. Wayne Probate Judge, 96 Mich. 11.

¶ 52. The writ of mandamus is a discretionary writ, and it must clearly appear that the party to whom it is directed has the power to execute it; otherwise, it will not be issued.—Fuchs v. Common Council Village of Grass Lake, 166 Mich. 569.

¶ 53. Mandamus will not lie to compel a circuit judge to overrule his finding that the proceedings taken for the condemnation of a site for a schoolhouse were irregular, and to compel him to enter judgment for the amount found due against the district.—Delhi School Dist. No. 5 v. Ingham Circuit Judge, 49 Mich. 432.

¶ 54. Where, in a proceeding by a state and under a state law to condemn lands for the purposes of the general government, the state abandons the proceeding before its completion, and the owner of the lands applies for a mandamus to compel it to be carried through, the question of the state power is necessarily involved. Such a condemnation might be effectual if the general government has accepted the land, and the owner had received the compensation awarded, for a statute may transfer title in any form the parties mutually assent to, but until the assent of both is signified the proceeding must be wholly inoperative.—People ex rel. Trombley v. Humphrey, 23 Mich. 471.

¶ 55. Mandamus will not lie against the board of assessors to strike an improper tax assessment from the rolls, where the writ would be unavailing by reason of the fact that the rolls would at the time of its issuance be out of the hands of the assessors, and in the custody of the collectors.—W. A. Sturgeon & Co. v. Board Assessors City of Detroit, 159 Mich. 199.

Denial of writ to aid or further illegality, see post § 11.

Delay and laches affecting propriety of issuance, see post § 12.

¶ 56. The issuance of a writ of mandamus is not a matter of right, but is a matter of discretion, and should be issued only where it appears that justice requires it.—MacKinnon v. Auditor General, 130 Mich. 552; Grand Rapids & I. Ry. Co. v. Auditor General, 144 Mich. 77.

¶ 57. Mandamus will be allowed only in furtherance of justice upon a proper case presented. It will not be allowed where it is apparent that it is applied for to gratify the spite of a private individual, or where the relator has instigated, authorized or approved the act complained of.—Hale v. Risley, 69 Mich. 596.

¶ 58. The writ of mandamus is a discretionary writ, and will not be issued when inconsistent with justice.—Wooster v. Calhoun Circuit Judge, 150 Mich. 459.

¶ 59. Mandamus is a discretionary writ, and should not issue where it works an injustice.—Craig v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 192 Mich. 106.

¶ 60. The rule that mandamus is not a writ of right and will only be allowed in the furtherance of justice upon a proper case presented, and will not be granted to accomplish an illegal purpose though the officer against whom it is invoked is charged with an express statutory duty, is as applicable to the circuit court as to the supreme court.—Cook v. Board Election Com'rs Cheboygan Co., 172 Mich. 437; George N. Fletcher & Sons v. Alpena Circuit Judge, 136 Mich. 511.

¶ 62. This writ is discretionary, and should always be refused where the record shows the injustice of relator's claim.—Van Akin v. Dunn, 117 Mich. 421.

¶ 63. The writ of mandamus is discretionary, hence the plea of the statute of limitations may be entertained and the writ refused, where the answer shows that the claim (upon a contingent county order) is fraudulent, and relator does not ask for the trial of an issue.—Merrill v. Gladwin County Treasurer, 61 Mich. 95.

¶ 64. Because his demand is inequitable and unjust, a holder of a city warrant issued to pay for street improvements cannot have a mandamus to compel the city to pay it out of the fund derived from a tax levied for that purpose, but which assessment the relator in another action had succeeded in having declared illegal.—Mason v. City of Gladstone, 93 Mich. 232.

¶ 65. The court in its discretion may refuse the writ altogether unless the party seeking it consents to do equity.—Stevens v. Saginaw County Sup'rs, 62 Mich. 579.

¶ 66. The writ of mandamus is discretionary, and those who invoke its aid must come into court with clean hands; it cannot be invoked to accomplish a purpose confessedly illegal, even though the officer against whom it is invoked is charged with an express duty under the statute.—Board of Supervisors of Cheboygan County v. Supervisor of Township of Mentor, 94 Mich. 386.

¶ 67. Relator railroad company repeatedly promised the city to build a bridge over a street which it crossed. Assurances were thus made during a number of years; no defense was made to proceedings to compel it; and defendant was in contempt for failing to obey the order of the circuit judge to build the bridge. Held, the relator was not in a position to ask the grace of the court to issue a writ of mandamus to vacate the order of the circuit judge.—Chicago, D. & C. G. T. Junct. R. Co. v. St. Clair Circuit Judge, 156 Mich. 567.

Invalidity in or objection to claim against the public as bar to mandamus to compel payment, see post § 95.

¶ 68. Mandamus will not be issued to aid in enforcement of an illegal claim.—Detroit Board of Education v. Detroit Common Council, 80 Mich. 548.

¶ 69. Mandamus to compel the common council of Detroit to order the issuing of bonds to purchase lands for a park contracted for by the board of park commissioners was denied as encroaching on the constitutional rights and functions of the city.—People ex rel. Detroit Park Com'rs v. Detroit Common Council, 28 Mich. 228.

¶ 70. Mandamus on the relation of a board of supervisors will not lie to compel individual supervisors who have opposed a fraudulent vote of money by the board to spread on their respective assessment rolls their proportion of the fraudulent tax.—Board of Supervisors of Cheboygan County v. Supervisor of Township of Mentor, 94 Mich. 386.

¶ 71. In mandamus proceedings against a municipal officer to compel the execution of certain bonds of the municipality, respondent may set up the illegality of the election by which the issue of such bonds was provided for.—Daniels v. Long, 111 Mich. 562.

¶ 72. Where one's unfitness for an official position from which he has been summarily removed is conceded, he cannot invoke the aid of the discretionary writ of mandamus to exact payment of salary for a period succeeding his discharge, even though his removal may have been illegal because without opportunity for hearing and defense.—McQueen v. Detroit Common Council of Detroit, 116 Mich. 90.

¶ 73. The Detroit controller could not be compelled by mandamus to draw a warrant for the salary of a clerk, where the city board of estimates had stricken out the item in question from the estimate of expenses for the office of the city board of assessors, nor could he be compelled to pay such items from other sources than taxation. (Following Robinson v. Detroit, 107 Mich. 168.)—City of Detroit v. Blades, 133 Mich. 249.

¶ 74. Where a village ordinance forbids the keeping of saloons or saloon bars or the sale of liquor in saloons or bars, mandamus will not lie to force the council to issue a license to sell liquor at a hotel bar.—Boos v. Scudder, 163 Mich. 678.

¶ 75. On April 20, 1911, a village council passed an ordinance prohibiting saloons, to be effective on May 10, 1911. On April 22, 1911, relator filed a petition and bond for a saloon license, which petition was rejected by the council on May 4, 1911. On May 8, 1911, relator presented a petition to the circuit court praying that a mandamus should issue requiring said council to meet within a reasonable time for the purpose of considering and acting upon the application of relator and to require said council to approve same. The hearing on said petition was held on May 22d. Held, mandamus was properly refused.—Fuchs v. Common Council Village of Grass Lake, 166 Mich. 569.

¶ 76. A writ of mandamus to compel a village council to issue relator a saloon license will not be denied on the ground that the result will be to give the village four saloons instead of the three lawfully allowed, where said relator is not responsible for the unlawful action of the council in producing that result.—Rhode v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 168 Mich. 683. (Moore, C. J., dissenting.)

Denial of writ to enforce payment of barred claim, see also ante ¶ 63.

Laches and delay as bar to mandamus to judicial officers, see post § 23.

¶ 77. Mandamus is not a writ of right, and is not usually allowed to those who have been culpably dilatory or otherwise at fault.—People ex rel. Mabley v. Detroit Superior Judge, 41 Mich. 31.

¶ 78. Where the statute of limitations is interposed to prevent the payment of a just claim, the court may refuse to permit the plea to interfere with issuing the writ when the period has been less than ten years.—Merrill v. Gladwin County Treasurer, 61 Mich. 95; County of Oceana v. Hart Township Sup'rs, 48 Mich. 319.

¶ 79. Mandamus being a discretionary writ will not issue when inconsistent with justice, and though it is a legal process it is governed by equitable principles and will not lie when legal redress is barred by the statute of limitations.—McRae v. Auditor General, 146 Mich. 594.

¶ 80. Mandamus is a discretionary writ, partaking of the nature of a bill in equity for specific performance, wherein stale claims are not favored.—Yeomans v. Board Sup'rs Ionia Co., 174 Mich. 451.

¶ 81. Mandamus proceedings for the purpose of collecting a debt are not different from any other suits, and are barred by laches, the bar following by analogy the statute of limitations.—Yeomans v. Board Sup'rs Ionia Co., 174 Mich. 451.

¶ 82. Mandamus to compel the quartermaster-general to receive a claim for a state bounty, provided for by act 27 of 1865, and under § 1 of act 132 of 1871 to examine and allow the claim and forward a certificate to the auditor-general, was denied in 1881 for laches.—Blanchard v. Church, 47 Mich. 644.

¶ 83. A delay for more than six years to demand payment of township and highway orders, or to apply for mandamus to compel such payment, if unexplained, will bar relief by such writ.—Avery v. Township Board of Township of Krakow, 73 Mich. 622.

¶ 84. Mandamus was not allowed to enforce the payment of a claim for salary as a city officer where the relator first elected to sue in assumpsit, but left the action undetermined, and, after ten years had passed from the date of his claim, sought his remedy by mandamus from the supreme court.—Walcott v. City of Jackson, 51 Mich. 249.

¶ 85. Mandamus having been determined to be the appropriate remedy to enforce payment of a claim against a county, it was not defeated on the ground of laches, where the statute of limitations had not run against the claim.—Hanna v. Chalker, 136 Mich. 8.

¶ 86. Mandamus being a discretionary writ, its issue to compel the payment of a county order will be refused, when the answer sets up the plea of the statute of limitations, and also shows that the claim is fraudulent, and the relator does not ask for the trial of an issue to determine the fact of fraud.—Merrill v. Gladwin County Treasurer, 61 Mich. 95.

¶ 87. Where a complainant has failed to enforce a claim against a county for nearly eight years, he having officially come in possession of all the facts in connection therewith, his laches will bar a writ of mandamus.—Yeomans v. Board Sup'rs Ionia Co., 174 Mich. 451.

¶ 88. Mandamus to compel the placing of certain property on an assessment roll is denied when applied for so late as to deprive the parties of the right to have the assessment reviewed.—Maurer v. Cliff, 94 Mich. 194.

¶ 89. A county treasurer cannot be compelled by mandamus to issue tax-deeds for lands purchased by relator under § 80 of the tax-law of 1891, where it appears that before the writ was applied for, relator accepted a tender by respondent of the purchase-money, and that before tender back the lands were conveyed to others.—Aitcheson v. Huebner, 90 Mich. 648.

¶ 90. Mandamus proceedings to compel the auditor general to refund the amount paid at an invalid tax sale must fail where the petitioner has waited for fourteen years before bringing such suit, the state having the right in such proceedings to invoke the statute of limitations.—Wilkinson v. Auditor General, 147 Mich. 13.

¶ 91. A delay of fifteen years by the holder of drain orders in seeking by mandamus to compel the reassessment of a tax where a previous assessment had been set aside for irregularities, is sufficient to bar relief, where such remedy was available from the time he acquired the orders.—McDermott v. Alger, 186 Mich. 278.

¶ 92. Mandamus is granted to compel the board of education of the city of Detroit to rescind a resolution reconsidering one passed at a former meeting adopting a text-book for use in place of one which had been in use for upwards of five years, and making a different selection; it appearing that in the interim the publishers of the book first adopted, and the patrons of the school, had acted in reliance upon the rescinded resolution in the sale and purchase of books.—Jones v. Board of Education of City of Detroit, 88 Mich. 371.

¶ 93. Although the charter and ordinances of a city require the official printing to be done in a newspaper published in such city, a local publisher whose bid has been rejected cannot compel the city, by mandamus, to award him the contract, after it has been let to outside parties and partly performed.—Clark v. Mayor of West Bay City, 112 Mich. 283.

¶ 94. Where, pending proceedings to compel the common council of a city to approve a paving contract made with the relator by the board of public works, the contract is let to another party, and the work done, mandamus will be denied, and the relator left to his action against the city.—Talbot Paving Co. v. Common Council of City of Detroit, 91 Mich. 262.

See also ante ¶ 17.
Availability of redress by nonjudicial action, see post § 14.
Mandamus or other remedy as proper one, see post §§ 15, 24-27.
Statutory proceeding to spread judgment on tax roll as remedy rather than mandamus to enforce payment, see post ¶ 633.
Denial of mandamus without prejudice to other remedy, see post § 173.
Judgment as bar or estoppel, see Former Adjudication.

¶ 95. Mandamus is not granted where relator has any other adequate legal remedy.—People ex rel. Willing v. Jackson Circuit Judges, 1 D. 302; People ex rel. Bradley v. Branch Circuit Judges, 1 D. 319; People ex rel. Brower v. Wayne County Judge, 1 Mich. 359; People ex rel. Monroe v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 19 Mich. 296; People ex rel. Wiley v. Allegan Circuit Judge, 29 Mich. 487; Burt v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 82 Mich. 251; Corby v. Wayne Probate Judge, 96 Mich. 11; Eyke v. Lange, 104 Mich. 26; Cattermole v. Ionia Circuit Judge, 136 Mich. 274; Hartz v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 164 Mich. 231.

¶ 96. Mandamus will not be awarded in cases where another remedy is provided by law.—People ex rel. Drew v. Washtenaw Circuit Judges, 1 D. 434.

¶ 97. Mandamus is not a writ of right, and will not lie, as a general rule, when the law has provided another remedy.—Trumbull Motor Car Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 189 Mich. 554.

¶ 98. Mandamus is not to be resorted to when there is a plain, direct, and adequate remedy at law.—Coffin v. Board of Education of Detroit, 114 Mich. 342.

¶ 99. Mandamus is the proper remedy for enforcing a specific legal right for which there is no other adequate legal remedy, and it is not excluded by other legal remedies which are not adequate to secure the specific relief needed, nor by the existence of a specific remedy in equity.—People ex rel. La Grange Township v. State Treasurer, 24 Mich. 468.

¶ 100. Mandamus may issue where other remedies exist, if they are not sufficiently speedy to prevent material injury.—Tawas & B. C. R. Co. v. Iosco Circuit Judge, 44 Mich. 479.

¶ 101. Remedy by mandamus is not precluded by the fact that the respondent may be liable as for a misdemeanor in wilfully neglecting his duty; a criminal prosecution will not secure its performance, and specific compliance can be enforced only by mandamus.—People ex rel. Ayres v. State Board of Auditors, 42 Mich. 422.

¶ 102. While the writ of mandamus has been treated as in its nature discretionary and prerogative, and not necessarily limited by strict rules to cases involving positive statutory duties, or in which there is an entire absence of any other remedy, yet it has been frequently said that the writ will not be granted where there is another adequate remedy.—Waterman-Waterbury Co. v. Cato Township School Dist. No. 4, 188 Mich. 168.

¶ 103. Mandamus asked by the board of water commissioners of East Saginaw to compel the common council to levy a tax to pay bonds issued by the board, and about to mature, was denied, as the board had a remedy, by issuing new bonds, to meet the old ones.—People ex rel. Board of Water Com'rs v. East Saginaw Common Council, 33 Mich. 164.

¶ 104. The police justice of Grand Rapids has no authority to proceed against the supervisors of the county by mandamus to compel them to audit and allow to the city the fees charged by the act creating the police court, upon the county, in cases tried before him; the act being construed to require him to collect the costs imposed by him upon individuals, but not such as were payable by the county to the city, under the same.—People ex rel. McBride v. Kent County Sup'rs, 38 Mich. 421.

Other adequate remedy as reason against writ, see ante § 13, post § 24 et seq.

Offices and functions of other remedies, see specific topics treating of such remedies, e. g., Injunctions, I; Certiorari; Appeal, I; Quo Warranto.

Common law and statutory rights to jury trial of issues, see Jury, I.

¶ 105. Mandamus, not injunction, is the proper remedy where nothing remains but the enforcement of a legal duty on a public officer's part.—Webster v. Newell, 66 Mich. 503.

¶ 106. Bill in equity, and not mandamus, is the proper remedy to restrain a city council from wrongfully submitting to a vote of the electorate a proposed amendment to the city charter.—Attorney General ex rel. Hudson v. Common Council City of Detroit, 164 Mich. 369. (Ostrander, C. J., and McAlvay and Blair, JJ., dissenting.)

¶ 107. The fact that there is a specific remedy in equity does not necessarily oust the jurisdiction of a common-law court in mandamus, but only appeals to its discretion, which may be exercised where the circumstances call for prompt interference by the courts.—Tawas & B. C. R. Co. v. Iosco Circuit Judge, 44 Mich. 479.

¶ 108. Mandamus against the proper officers to compel the levy and collection of the tax as provided by law is the remedy of the seller of road machinery to the road commissioners, to recover the price thereof, under Comp. L. 1897, §§ 4193-4197, which authorizes commissioners of highways in townships to purchase tools and machinery for making roads, and provides for a highway tax to raise funds for the payment therefor, and assumpsit against such township will not lie; since the township is not primarily liable, no contract relations existing between it and the seller of such machines; and the road districts in such townships, which through such commissioners purchased such machines, are not municipalities, which can assume obligations and sue and be sued.—Pape v. Township of Benton, 140 Mich. 165.

[Note. For convenience the compellable judicial duties have been collated, post §§ 28-68, the compellable administrative, executive, and ministerial duties, post §§ 74-109, and the private duties, post §§ 110-122. Only the general nature of the duties which may be compelled is treated here (§§ 16-19).]

Existing, mature, and certain duty as basis for writ, see ante § 4.

Clear legal duty, see also ante ¶ 15.

Political and executive functions of government, see post § 69.

Writ for part of performance demanded, see post § 172.

¶ 109. If a statute imposes a special duty, either in terms or by fair and reasonable implication, and there is no other specific remedy, mandamus may be awarded to compel performance of the duty.—People ex rel. Secretary of State v. State Ins. Co., 19 Mich. 392.

¶ 110. Mandamus does not lie to enforce a contract; as where the relator is a bank, seeking to compel the respondent, an officer of a public board, to deposit with it, as required by law, funds to the custody of which it is entitled under a bid made therefor to the board.—Port Huron Board of Education v. Runnels, 57 Mich. 46.

¶ 111. The remedy by mandamus is not adapted to cases calling for continuous action, varying according to circumstances.—Diamond Match Co. v. Powers, 51 Mich. 145.

To control or review judicial discretion, see post § 28.

¶ 112. Mandamus lies only to enforce strict legal rights, and will not be granted to enforce the doing of an act which by law lies in the discretion of the officer refusing to do it.—People ex rel. Houghton County v. Auditor General, 36 Mich. 271.

¶ 113. The writ is granted to compel the performance of a ministerial act, but not to inquire into the proper exercise of judicial discretion.—People ex rel. Sweet v. Adam, 3 Mich. 427.

Compellable private duties, see post § 110 et seq.

¶ 114. Though the writ is generally used to enforce the performance of public rights and duties, it may also be resorted to for the enforcement of private rights, when withheld by public officers.—People ex rel. Bristow v. Macomb County Supervisors, 3 Mich. 475.

See also post ¶ 932.

Declination of questions of title collateral to right or duty asserted, see also post § 154 et seq.

Correction of improper injunction against interference with rights in office, see post § 45, ¶¶ 319, 320.

¶ 115. Mandamus is not the proper proceeding to try the title to a public office.—People ex rel. Cuthbert v. Detroit Common Council, 18 Mich. 338; People ex rel. Mead v. Ingham County Treasurer, 36 Mich. 416; Moiles v. Watson, 60 Mich. 415; Tallmadge Township School Dist. No. 8 v. Root, 61 Mich. 373; Frey v. Michie, 68 Mich. 323.

¶ 117. Respondent, running for the office of supervisor, demanded a recount by the board of canvassers, and upon their decision in his favor took the oath and entered upon the duties of the office. Held, mandamus proceedings begun by a rival candidate thereafter were not the proper remedy to try respondent's title to the office.—Miner v. Beurmann, 165 Mich. 672.

¶ 118. This writ is not the proper proceeding to oust one who is in the exercise of official duties, especially when he is not a party to the proceedings.—Pariseau v. Board of Education of Escanaba, 96 Mich. 302.

¶ 119. Mandamus to compel performance of official duty is not the proper method of trying the title to an office the de facto incumbent of which is not made a party to the proceeding.—Keeler v. Deo, 117 Mich. 1.

¶ 120. Although title to office will not usually be settled upon an application for mandamus, yet where the public interest demands it, and where a person in office de jure et de facto is interfered with by one whose lack of title is plain, it is proper to settle the question by mandamus.—Lawrence v. Hanley, 84 Mich. 399.

¶ 121. When the necessity is pressing and one entitled to hold office is an officer de facto as well as de jure, the court may determine his right thereto in a mandamus proceeding.—Lichtig v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 180 Mich. 667.

¶ 122. Mandamus was not the proper remedy to compel an actual incumbent of the office of secretary of a village school board to turn over to another claimant to the office, the books and papers pertaining to such office; where respondent claimed to be the secretary and denied the title of the relator not only to the office of secretary but also to the office of trustee.—Ashwell v. Bullock, 122 Mich. 620.

¶ 123. The title of a town supervisor, prima facie entitled to the office and claiming to have been duly appointed and to be entitled to the books pertaining to the office, will not be tried in mandamus proceedings.—Pipper v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 122 Mich. 688.

¶ 124. Mandamus will not try the question of corporate existence.—People ex rel. Chapman v. State Land Office Com'r, 26 Mich. 146.

¶ 125. Mandamus is not a proper remedy to determine the boundaries of the franchises of two municipal boards, claiming the same power of appointment.—Frey v. Michie, 68 Mich. 323.

II. COMPULSION OF JUDICIAL DUTIES AND REVIEW OF PROCEEDINGS.

Appellate or original character of mandamus, see ante § 2.

Extent of power to issue mandamus in supervisory control of lower tribunals, see Courts § 55.

Necessity of duty and clear legal right to performance and of exigency and beneficial occasion, see ante §§ 4-7.

Futility of writ as reason against allowance, see ante §§ 8, 9.

Impolicy, injustice, misconduct, unfairness and delay as barring issuance, see ante §§ 10-12.

Motion or request for action to fix duty, see post § 22.
Laches or other delay as bar to relief, see post § 23.
Other remedy as primary recourse, see post §§ 24-27.
Review of discretion or decisions of fact, see post §§ 28, 29.
Particular acts and proceedings compellable or reviewable, see post §§ 30-68.
Sufficiency of relator's interest, see post §§ 126-128.
Scope of review and matters considered, see post § 154 et seq.
Procedure for issuance of the writ and procedure on the writ, see post V.

¶ 126. A mandamus is allowed only to set the inferior jurisdiction in motion; but not for the purpose of requiring it to come to any particular conclusion, or of retracing its steps where it has already acted; and this notwithstanding the party has no other remedy.—People ex rel. Brower v. Wayne County Judge, 1 Mich. 359.

¶ 127. Mandamus is a proper process for setting a court in motion, but not for reviewing its affirmative judicial action, if there is any other effectual remedy.—Lloyd v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 56 Mich. 236.

¶ 128. The supreme court may, by mandamus, compel a judicial officer to proceed, hear, and decide, but can neither dictate his determination in advance nor review it after it is made by that writ.—Lyle v. Cass Circuit Judge, 157 Mich. 33.

¶ 129. Although mandamus will lie to compel a circuit judge to sign a decree upon his refusal to sign any decree, it will not lie to compel the signing of a particular decree.—Ambos v. Ingham Circuit Judge, 123 Mich. 618.

See also post ¶ 278.
Necessity of payment or tender to mature right, see also post ¶ 455.
Necessity of notice to fix duty to settle bill of exceptions, see post ¶ 399.
Necessity and sufficiency of allegations in petition, see post § 136.
Sufficiency of the record to show breach of duty, see post § 161 et seq.
Declination of questions not presented to or considered by respondent judge, see post § 156.
Denial of writ without further inquiry for want of previous motion to respondent, see post ¶ 994.
Statutory provision dispensing with motion to vacate order made on hearing, see Jud. Act, chap. XXXVI, § 2; Comp. L. 1915, § 13438.

¶ 130. The writ will not be granted where the application is for something different from that for which the party has laid the foundation. The refusal of the circuit court to grant a motion for an assessment of damages in replevin is not a proper foundation for an application to the supreme court for a mandamus commanding the circuit court to impanel a jury to assess the value of the property replevied.—People ex rel. Willing v. Jackson Circuit Judges, 1 D. 302.

¶ 131. A party to a cause is not entitled to mandamus to compel a circuit judge to file certain findings of law and fact, where he has neither made application to frame the issues to be tried by the court nor given the other party opportunity to prepare to meet them.—Caille Bros. Co. v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 155 Mich. 480.

¶ 132. Where no application to the trial court to vacate an order has been made mandamus will not issue to compel it to be done.—Swarthout v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 99 Mich. 347.

¶ 133. A writ of mandamus to set aside an order of a circuit judge may be properly denied where no application was made to the trial court to set aside the order complained of.—Mesler v. Jackson Circuit Judge, 188 Mich. 195.

¶ 134. Mandamus commanding the circuit court to set aside an order setting aside an order of default and an order of reference will be denied by this court where the relator has made no motion before the circuit court to vacate the order made.—Aitken v. Chippewa Circuit Judge, 146 Mich. 129.

¶ 135. It is not proper to bring mandamus to vacate an order of the circuit court granting a change of venue unless application therefor is first made to the circuit judge.—Freud v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 131 Mich. 606.

¶ 136. A motion to dissolve a temporary injunction is a formal prerequisite to an application for a mandamus to compel the vacating of the same.—Blain v. Chippewa Circuit Judge, 145 Mich. 59.

¶ 137. On a bill in chancery to avoid deeds obtained by defendant railroad company for a right of way, the court decreed that the deeds were void, but, as defendant had entered upon the land in good faith believing it had title, ordered that defendant should be enjoined from going on the premises or continuing its work unless it should deposit with the register a sum sufficient to cover any prospective award of damages to be made in condemnation proceedings to be begun within twenty days, and that in case of failure to make such deposit or to take such proceedings within the time, the case should be heard on four days' notice. On failure to agree as to the amount to be deposited, a reference was had, defendant examined witnesses, and at its motion the court fixed the sum. Complainant then applied to the supreme court for a mandamus requiring the court to vacate all its orders except the finding that the deeds were void, and directing it to proceed to final decree. Held, that a motion below by complainant for final decree was an essential prerequisite to the application.—Chesebro v. Kent Circuit Judge, 70 Mich. 650.

¶ 138. One who has obtained judgment by default and not on the merits is not entitled to mandamus to compel a circuit judge to enter "final judgment" where he has not made clear that the kind of final judgment he demanded was one determining the action only.—Orsland v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 138 Mich. 395.

¶ 139. An application for mandamus to compel the circuit court to enter judgment on motion is premature where it appears from the return that the motion is still pending and that respondent has been at all times ready to dispose of the motion and either enter or refuse to enter judgment upon the disposal of the motion; the proper remedy being to ask the court to dispose of the motion.—Presthus v. Gogebic Circuit Judge, 142 Mich. 204.

¶ 140. An application for an order to show cause will be considered even though application has not been made to the circuit court, where the circuit judge is disqualified.—Manly v. Washtenaw Probate Judge, 97 Mich. 615 (note).

¶ 141. Under Comp. L. 1897, § 10504, a relator may bring mandamus to compel the trial court to include in the bill of exceptions the proceedings relating to a motion for a new trial and the reasons given by the judge for overruling the motion, although the relator made no request of the trial judge that he would file his reasons with his decision on the motion.—United States Graphite Co. v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 158 Mich. 598.

¶ 142. Where a petition is made to a court for the discharge of a person from imprisonment for failure to pay a judgment, it is not necessary that such person make another application to the judge for the vacation of the order of imprisonment in order to entitle him to bring mandamus against the judge for the vacation of such order.—Lapham v. Oakland Circuit Judge, 170 Mich. 564.

¶ 143. In the absence of an application to a trial judge to vacate an order quashing an information in a criminal case, a writ of mandamus will not issue to compel him to do so.—Bennett v. Kalamazoo Circuit Judge, 181 Mich. 700. (Ostrander, J., dissenting.)

¶ 144. Mandamus to compel the amendment of a judgment for the defendant in replevin so as to require return of the property was denied where the application was not made until several terms of the court after execution had been satisfied, nor until a new judge was elected.—Gray v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 49 Mich. 628.

¶ 145. Mandamus to compel amendment of bill of exceptions was denied where one term had passed and assignments of error had been filed by relator.—People ex rel. Fowler v. Manistee Circuit Judge, 81 Mich. 72.

¶ 146. Mandamus to compel allowance of filing of exceptions to special findings was denied where motion for leave had been delayed a long time.—Eggleston v. Kent Circuit Judge, 50 Mich. 147.

¶ 147. Mandamus will not issue to compel a circuit judge to sign a bill of exceptions where relator has rested upon the finality of the judgment below for two years.—Besser v. Alpena Circuit Judge, 155 Mich. 631.

¶ 148. Upon a petition for mandamus to compel a circuit judge to grant an extension of time for settling a bill of exceptions, the claim that relator was guilty of laches is untenable where it appears that the delay was caused by the absence of respondent.—Harper v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 155 Mich. 543.

¶ 149. The discretion of a circuit judge in ordering a new appeal-bond to be filed by defendant who has appealed from a judgment in summary proceedings to recover possession of land, will not be interfered with by mandamus where the appellant could have filed a new bond or made a showing before the circuit court of the sufficiency of the sureties in the original bond.—Felcher v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 97 Mich. 638.

¶ 150. After the time for bringing certiorari has expired mandamus will not lie to vacate an order dismissing an appeal from the probate court.—Crittenden v. Macomb Circuit Judge, 97 Mich. 637.

¶ 151. Where the receiver of a corporation has recovered judgment against a debtor of such corporation, and duly assigned the judgment to the corporation, and later filed a petition for his dismissal and the discharge of the sureties on his bond, mandamus will not issue on petition of the judgment debtor to set aside a conditional order that the receiver and his sureties be discharged, unless such judgment debtor pay the expenses of an extension of his bond; where it appears that the judgment debtor delayed applying for a new trial until after the time for taking out a writ of error had expired and, after a new trial was granted, delayed bringing it on.—Wooster v. Calhoun Circuit Judge, 150 Mich. 459.

¶ 152. Pub. Acts 1907, No. 312, giving the railroad commission power to establish rates, provides that a bill in equity filed by the railroad to test the validity of an order of the commission shall take precedence in the circuit and supreme courts over all other cases. A final determination can be secured within sixty days. The relator railroad allowed over sixty days to elapse after the filing of the commissioner's answer in relator's suit for injunction in the circuit court. Held, relator was not as a matter of law entitled to a writ of mandamus to compel the circuit judge to issue a temporary injunction.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 156 Mich. 459.

¶ 153. After six years' delay mandamus to compel the probate court to set aside its adjudication of mental incompetency on jurisdictional grounds was denied.—Coot v. Willett, 93 Mich. 304.

¶ 154. Mandamus will not issue on the ground of irreparable injury to compel the dissolution of a temporary injunction restraining the construction of a drainage ditch, where the applicant secured a postponement after an early hearing of the cause had been secured by stipulation; since his injuries, if any, were due to his own negligence.—Chatfield v. Lenawee Circuit Judge, 140 Mich. 636.

Prohibition rather than mandamus is the remedy where an exercise of unwarranted jurisdiction is to be prevented in the future as well as to vacate orders already made. See Prohibition.

¶ 155. Mandamus never lies to review irregularities in the judicial action of an inferior tribunal where the party injured has another adequate remedy—O'Brien v. Tallman, 36 Mich. 13.

¶ 156. Mandamus will not lie when there is another adequate remedy by appeal.—Mardian v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 118 Mich. 353.

¶ 157. It is a general rule that the writ of mandamus does not lie where the law has provided another remedy.—Glinnan v. Detroit Recorder's Court Judge, 173 Mich. 674.

¶ 158. The supreme court will not review an interlocutory order of a court by mandamus if there is another adequate remedy.—Zemon v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 171 Mich. 589.

¶ 159. The writ of mandamus will not be allowed to take the place of an appeal or a writ of prohibition, or any other writ to review the action of the lower court.—Wells v. Montcalm Circuit Judge, 139 Mich. 544.

¶ 160. An execution on the judgment in a cause appealed from before a justice was antedated, and a motion to require the sheriff to return it for correction was denied. Mandamus to compel the circuit judge to grant the motion was denied, as in any proceeding against the sureties on the appeal bond the facts could be shown.—Jennings v. Kalamazoo Circuit Judge, 44 Mich. 99.

¶ 161. A mandamus to compel a circuit judge to imprison, for contempt for refusal to answer questions, a complainant in a suit in equity pending in another state, who had been summoned before the judge as a witness under How. St. § 7455, was denied, on the ground that the court in which the suit was pending had power to compel the party to make any proper disclosure by refusing to allow him to proceed until he should do so.—Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Jennison, 60 Mich. 232.

Office and functions of writ of error and appeal, see Appeal, I.

¶ 162. Mandamus will not lie where there is a remedy by appeal or writ of error.—Lyle v. Cass Circuit Judge, 157 Mich. 33.

¶ 163. Except in cases where delay is calculated to produce injury, mandamus will not issue to control the action of the circuit judge if the aggrieved party has a remedy by appeal or writ of error. So held where the writ was sought to compel the circuit judge to quash a summons for alleged insufficient service.—Michigan Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 112 Mich. 270.

¶ 164. Mandamus should not issue where error or appeal will lie, except where the slowness of legal forms is likely to produce immediate injury or mischief which ought to be prevented.—Cattermole v. Ionia Circuit Judge, 136 Mich. 274.

¶ 165. The fact that an appeal from an order that evidence in a chancery suit be heard in open court would be expensive does not justify the bringing of mandamus to vacate the order.—Tarsney v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 152 Mich. 641.

¶ 166. Mandamus is not the proper remedy for the review of an appealable order in a chancery case.—Thomas v. Wayne Circuit Judges, 97 Mich. 606; Hall v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 111 Mich. 395.

¶ 167. Mandamus will not lie to obtain a decision upon the merits in a chancery case, appeal being the proper remedy.—Sherwood v. Ionia Circuit Judge, 105 Mich. 540.

¶ 168. In a bill for divorce, a wife secured a ruling giving her possession of the furniture formerly used by herself and husband. On mandamus to vacate the order, held, that although the relator husband might be legally entitled to the furniture, the supreme court would not review the discretion of the lower court where the order entered was final and appealable, and no injustice appeared to be done.—Price v. Kent Circuit Judge, 159 Mich. 614.

¶ 169. Mandamus will not lie to determine which circuit court has jurisdiction of a divorce proceeding, where relator has pleaded the pendency of a suit in another county in abatement of one brought before respondent, since the question could be determined on appeal.—Wells v. Montcalm Circuit Judge, 139 Mich. 544.

¶ 170. Mandamus will not lie to review irregularities in the judicial action of an inferior court; error is the proper remedy.—People ex rel. Mabley v. Detroit Superior Judge, 32 Mich. 190.

¶ 171. Mandamus does not lie where the remedy sought is the revision of a final judgment on matters of record, and where everything necessary to a determination may be returned on writ of error.—Olson v. Muskegon Circuit Judge, 49 Mich. 85.

¶ 172. Application was made for writ of mandamus to compel the respondent to set aside an order of court made by him. Held, that mandamus is not the proper remedy; that, the order being in effect a judgment, a complete and adequate remedy is open to plaintiff by writ of error.—Kingsley v. Kent Circuit Judge, 171 Mich. 305.

¶ 173. Mandamus will not be granted where a writ of error will afford adequate relief.—City of Flint v. Genesee Circuit Judge, 146 Mich. 439.

¶ 174. Mandamus not error is the proper remedy to review a judgment dependent on the question of the validity of a notice of trial.—Worth v. Hand, 30 Mich. 264.

¶ 175. Mandamus is not the proper remedy to compel a circuit judge to review a decree under which petitioner's land was sold for drainage taxes, and to allow petitioner to answer, the petitioner alleging the illegality of the tax and nonservice of subpoena, but not that the petition itself and the list of lands were not duly advertised; the statute authorizes an appeal.—Wiley v. Tuscola Circuit Judge, 86 Mich. 381.

Office and functions of certiorari, see Certiorari.

For cases holding that certiorari is not and that mandamus is the proper remedy, see also Certiorari § 7.

¶ 176. Mandamus is not the proper proceeding where the relief sought is the revision of a final judgment of matters of record, and where everything necessary to a determination may be returned on a writ of certiorari.—Hartz v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 164 Mich. 35.

¶ 177. Mandamus will not lie to compel a circuit judge to vacate an order denying a motion to dismiss quo warranto proceedings on the ground that leave of court to file the information was not obtained, another adequate remedy being available.—Peninsular Club of Grand Rapids v. Kent Circuit Judge, 150 Mich. 614.

¶ 178. Where a motion to dismiss quo warranto proceedings is made and denied, a contention on petition for mandamus, that a plea to the information would have been a waiver of the question of jurisdiction raised in the motion to dismiss, constitutes no reason for issuing the writ, the matter of waiver being one of choice.—Peninsular Club of Grand Rapids v. Kent Circuit Judge, 150 Mich. 614.

¶ 179. Mandamus is not the proper remedy to correct the action of the circuit court in allowing a new affidavit to be filed in an attachment case in the place of a void original.—People ex rel. Bradley v. Branch Circuit Judges, 1 D. 319.

¶ 180. Mandamus is not the proper remedy to compel a circuit judge to vacate an order denying an application to dissolve a writ of attachment; certiorari is the proper writ to review his ruling.—S. K. Martin Lumber Co. v. Menominee Circuit Judge, 116 Mich. 354.

¶ 181. Mandamus will not be granted to compel the circuit court to set aside defective proceedings, when the defects are such as may be obviated by amendment in that court.—People v. Calhoun Circuit Judges, 1 D. 417.

¶ 182. In a suit by a city to compel relator railroad to build a bridge over a street, the circuit court made a last adjournment of the suit on June 15, 1908, and directed the order against relator to be entered. It was not actually entered until August 7, 1908. Held, mandamus would not lie on this account to vacate the order, since the proceeding might be corrected by an order nunc pro tunc.—Chicago, D. & C. G. T. Junct. R. Co. v. St. Clair Circuit Judge, 156 Mich. 567.

Burden of showing improper exercise of discretion, see post § 163.

¶ 183. Mandamus does not lie to review the exercise of judicial discretion.—People ex rel. United States Attorney v. Monroe County Probate Judge, 16 Mich. 204; People ex. rel. Ætna Live Stock & Tornado Ins. Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 20 Mich. 220; People ex rel. Evans v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 89 Mich. 123; People ex rel. Mabley v. Detroit Superior Court Judge, 41 Mich. 31.

¶ 184. An order to stay waste is discretionary and will not be compelled by mandamus.—People ex rel. Parks v. Marquette Circuit Judge, 38 Mich. 244.

¶ 185. Mandamus does not lie to review the discretion of a circuit judge in refusing a motion to allow one judgment to be set off against another.—People ex rel. Wells v. St. Joseph Circuit Judge, 39 Mich. 21.

¶ 186. Mandamus will not be granted to review the refusal of a circuit court to rescind an order holding a party to bail, where bail was properly demandable; a fortiori where special bail had been perfected.—People ex rel. Cohn v. Detroit Superior Court Judge, 40 Mich. 169.

¶ 187. Where it is evident that an order setting aside a judgment would not have been granted but for a stipulation between the parties, the conditions of which have not been complied with, the order cannot be sustained as an exercise of discretion, and mandamus will lie to vacate it.—People ex rel. Roche v. Branch Circuit Judge, 26 Mich. 370.

Injunctional orders based on facts, see post § 45.
Probate decision as to fitness of appointee as personal representative, see post ¶ 463.
Refusal on showing of facts to open default, see post ¶ 354.

¶ 188. The decision of an inferior court acting judicially upon questions of fact, or of law, if the latter are properly before it for judicial determination, cannot, however erroneous, be reviewed by mandamus; but where the case does not, on facts or evidence, legitimately raise the question of law or fact decided, so that the court could act judicially upon it, its action is not properly judicial, and no assumed determination of the question, or order resting on it, will preclude the remedy by mandamus if the case is suited thereto in other respects.—People ex rel. Wiley v. Allegan Circuit Judge, 29 Mich. 487.

¶ 189. A motion for an order to show cause why a case should not be transferred was denied where the circuit judge, in the exercise of his statutory power, had passed upon certain disputed facts.—Passmore v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 54 Mich. 237.

¶ 190. Where solicitor for defendant below applies to the supreme court for mandamus to compel a circuit judge to grant a motion to vacate a decree in so far as it allows a fee to the solicitor for complainant, and to allow a fee to solicitor for defendant, the writ will be denied, where the respondent states in his return that he decided against the claim of relator from his knowledge of the history of the case, and the services rendered in it.—Wood v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 150 Mich. 71.

See also ante ¶ 163.
Mandamus to set aside or perfect service, see post § 31.

To compel admission to special bail, see ante ¶ 186.
Issuance and control of execution and other final executive writs, see post §§ 51, 52.
Issuance of warrants for arrest for crime, see post § 57.

Mandamus to compel circuit judge to issue mandamus, see also post ¶ 797.
Compelling action by justice of the peace, see post § 67.
Mandamus to test refusal to quash capias, see also Civil Arrest ¶ 85.
Occasion and duty to issue, quash, or control process, see Process; Attachment; Replevin.

¶ 191. Mandamus to compel the quashing of a writ of capias ad respondendum was denied, where the affidavit for capias stated a cause of action and the judge passed upon a disputed question on affidavits.—Krekler v. Kent Circuit Judge, 135 Mich. 94.

¶ 192. Mandamus will not lie to compel the setting aside of an order quashing a writ of capias ad respondendum, the judgment being final and there being a remedy by writ of error.—Cattermole v. Ionia Circuit Judge, 136 Mich. 274.

¶ 193. Mandamus will not lie to compel a circuit judge to allow a motion to discharge defendant sued by capias on the ground that the capias action has become res adjudicata and that the tort on which it is based has been waived by suit in assumpsit resulting in such judgment, both which facts are pleaded defensively in the capias suit; since the motion is not a proper way to anticipate and try the issues.—Polasky v. Kalamazoo Circuit Judge, 147 Mich. 197.

¶ 194. Vacation of an order denying an order to quash a capias and proceedings thereon will not be compelled at the relation of the person arrested on the ground that the affidavit is technically deficient, where relator has made it to appear to the court that the facts set out in the affidavit as appearing of record are true, and only the conclusions of law making the relator amenable to the writ are disputed.—Robinson v. Branch Circuit Judge, 142 Mich. 70.

¶ 195. Mandamus will not lie to compel the vacation of an order quashing a writ of replevin with costs, such order being final and reviewable on error.—Dages v. Sanilac Circuit Judge, 122 Mich. 490.

¶ 196. In the prosecution of a complaint made by a dairy and food inspector, the deputy attorney general of the state and the state's attorney had a controversy as to whether the state or the county should pay the subpoena, witness, and mileage fees. The circuit judge issued the subpoenas, with an entry on their face to the effect that the county should not be liable for the fees. Held, mandamus would lie to compel the judge to issue them without such entry, and in the usual form.—Chase v. Kalamazoo Circuit Judge, 154 Mich. 271.

¶ 197. Mandamus is not the proper remedy against abuse of process of courts, and against legal proceedings instituted for delay and annoyance.—Burt v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 82 Mich. 251.

¶ 198. The proper remedy, where a party to the record is aggrieved by an order granting a writ of assistance, is by appeal, and not by mandamus to compel the court to set aside the order.—Aldrich v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 111 Mich. 525.

¶ 199. Mandamus lies to vacate the service of a civil capias wrongfully issued.—Baldwin v. Branch Circuit Judge, 48 Mich. 525.

¶ 200. Mandamus lies to set aside the service of a summons if made upon one who at the time is outside of the jurisdiction in which he lives, and is there for the sole purpose of attending as a necessary witness in other cases.—Mitchell v. Huron Circuit Judge, 53 Mich. 541.

¶ 201. Mandamus will be granted to compel a judge to set aside a service of summons, where such service was breach of privilege and abuse of process.—Jacobson v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 76 Mich. 234.

¶ 202. On a writ of mandamus by the supreme court to set aside an order setting aside the service of a declaration on the ground the witness was privileged, the matter will be considered because the court below refused to retain jurisdiction, and because, further, the order setting aside the service of the declaration is not, necessarily, a final order, reviewable on error.—Coatsworth v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 177 Mich. 565.

Requiring entry of judgment on demurrer after pleading over, see also ante ¶ 40.
Propriety and duty of allowing amendment, striking, or other requested action on the pleadings, see Pleading; Equity, VII.

¶ 203. Mandamus is the proper remedy of the party seeking the reversal of a decision of the circuit court on a motion to strike a declaration from the files in a common-law action. The motion and decision would constitute no part of the common-law record, and exceptions could not be alleged to the decision.—People ex rel. Drew v. Washtenaw Circuit Judges, 1 D. 434.

¶ 204. Mandamus does not lie to set aside an irregular plea in chancery.—People ex rel. Hunt v. Jackson Circuit Judge, 41 Mich. 5.

¶ 205. Mandamus will not lie to review the action of a judge in striking a cross-bill in a divorce is impertinent and scandalous, the proper remedy being by appeal.—Kellogg v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 167 Mich. 95.

¶ 206. Mandamus will not lie to compel a judge to vacate an order striking a plea in abatement from the files, where the result would be different in no essential respect from what it would have been had a jury been directed to find for plaintiff upon a trial of the issue raised by such plea; as thereby the judge "proceeded and determined" the issues.—Steel v. Clinton Circuit Judge, 133 Mich. 695.

¶ 207. Mandamus will not lie to compel the setting aside of an order sustaining a demurrer to a plea in abatement.—Grand Rapids & I. Ry. Co. v. Charlevoix Circuit Judge, 133 Mich. 122, overruling Carpenter v. St. Clair Circuit Judge, 122 Mich. 323.

¶ 208. Where in the trial of a cause counsel for plaintiff declines to amend his complaint to show jurisdiction because no such declaration is necessary, either party may secure an order which will dispose of the case in the court below and review the ruling on error, a proceeding in which they will be entitled to have strict legal rights determined. Hence mandamus will not lie.—Reynolds v. Mecosta Circuit Judge, 148 Mich. 470.

¶ 209. Mandamus to compel the striking from the files of a replication in quo warranto to try the title to an office, on the grounds that certain averments regarding relator's title appeared for the first time in the replication and that under C. C. Rule 46 (e) the respondent was given no opportunity to reply, was denied, the circuit court having power, on special application, to permit a further reply, and such application being the proper practice.—Swart v. Chippewa Circuit Judge, 119 Mich. 598.

¶ 210. Mandamus lies to correct the action of the trial court in ordering a bill of particulars, if it goes beyond what is properly required to be stated in such a bill.—Van Vranken v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 85 Mich. 140.

¶ 211. Mandamus will not lie to review the decision of the trial court denying a motion that a more specific bill of particulars be filed in a suit in assumpsit, writ of error being the proper and adequate remedy.—Olds Motor Works v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 164 Mich. 470.

¶ 212. One Holmes sued relator for services rendered, and relator demanded a further bill of particulars. Holmes in a petition for discovery set forth that he was employed by relator, and that the latter had all the books in his possession containing a record of Holmes' services. Held, the lower court properly granted the petition to enable Holmes to prepare the bill of particulars, and mandamus to vacate the order should be dismissed.—Smith v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 158 Mich. 588.

¶ 213. Whether mandamus will lie to get rid of an amendment to a declaration whereby a new and distinct cause of action is introduced and the identity of the cause of action for which the suit was originally instituted is destroyed, quære.—People ex rel. Powers v. Kent Circuit Judge, 30 Mich. 387.

¶ 214. Mandamus will not be granted to compel a circuit judge to vacate an order denying, in his discretion, an amendment of a declaration.—Pratt v. Montcalm Circuit Judge, 105 Mich. 499.

¶ 215. The action of the circuit judge in permitting a plaintiff to amend his declaration, against defendant's objection that the amendment sets up a new and different cause of action, is not reviewable on mandamus but on error.—St. Clair Tunnel Co. v. St. Clair Circuit Judge, 114 Mich. 417.

¶ 216. Writ of error and not mandamus is the proper procedure to obtain review of an order setting aside an order allowing an amendment to a plea.—Skutt v. Kent Circuit Judge, 136 Mich. 477.

¶ 217. Mandamus is not a proper remedy to review the action of the Circuit Court in refusing to strike an amended declaration from the files on the ground that it sets up a new cause of action.—City of Detroit v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 125 Mich. 634.

¶ 218. An order before trial denying leave to file an amended declaration, being reviewable on error after judgment on proper exceptions, will not be reviewed by mandamus.—Jones v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 141 Mich. 408.

¶ 219. Mandamus will not lie to compel a circuit judge to strike from the files an amendment to a chancery bill, which amendment he has discretion to allow, for insufficiencies which can be remedied by another amendment.—Third National Bank v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 81 Mich. 438.

¶ 220. Mandamus is improper to require the striking from the files of an amended declaration which permitted plaintiff to continue the action in the name of herself as survivor of herself and her deceased husband after a decision by the Supreme Court that the action was single and could not be split, the original declaration having pleaded a sole cause of action.—Blackburn v. Alpena Circuit Judge, 136 Mich. 48.

¶ 221. In an eminent domain suit to appropriate land for a cemetery, the defendant in her answer set out that the city had contracted with a mining company by which the latter was to mine the land under the old cemetery for its own profit; that the mining company had secured new ground to which it agreed to remove the bodies from the old cemetery; that it had a predominating influence on the city government; and other like allegations. Held, mandamus would not lie to compel the circuit judge to vacate an order striking out these and other immaterial parts of the answer.—McDonald v. Marquette Circuit Judge, 159 Mich. 367.

Mandamus to correct orders on motions, see post § 36 et seq.

To compel hearing of motion relating to another judge's case, see also Judges ¶ 12.

¶ 222. Mandamus lies to compel the hearing of a motion for continuance made by parties who have filed no affidavit of merits to prevent inquest.—People ex rel. Begole v. Ionia Circuit Judge, 32 Mich. 61.

¶ 223. The supreme court will not review an interlocutory motion on mandamus when the court does not refuse to proceed with the case, if there is another adequate remedy, though mandamus may be resorted to in some cases if the court does so refuse.—Geddis v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 151 Mich. 122.

To compel setting down for hearing at term already past, see also ante ¶ 41.
Right to bring case on for trial or hearing and mode of taking proofs thereon, see Calendar; Equity, VIII; Trial.

¶ 224. Mandamus lies to compel a circuit judge to proceed to the hearing of a chancery cause in open court where such hearing has been regularly claimed, unless an order has been made upon good cause shown directing it to be proceeded in otherwise.—People ex rel. Stebbins v. Barry Circuit Judge, 27 Mich. 170.

¶ 225. Mandamus will not lie to compel a court to proceed with a trial that has been enjoined.—Ives v. Muskegon County Circuit Judge, 40 Mich. 63.

¶ 226. The writ will not compel a chancery judge to proceed with a hearing, where in his discretion he has postponed it awaiting the outcome of a law case pending on error and affecting the same subject matter.—Schmid v. Benzie Circuit Judge, 138 Mich. 452.

¶ 227. Mandamus lies to compel the vacating of an order dismissing a bill in chancery filed to wind up a mining company's affairs, and to compel the circuit court to proceed with the case.—Brown v. Pontiac Min. Co., 105 Mich. 653.

¶ 228. An order of the trial judge sending the issues in a suit for annulment of marriage to a jury will not be ordered vacated by mandamus in view of his right on his own motion to make another order for jury trial under How. St. § 6622, even if the first was erroneous.—Maier v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 112 Mich. 491.

¶ 229. An order that evidence in a chancery suit be heard in open court is appealable, and therefore mandamus to vacate it does not lie.—Tarsney v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 152 Mich. 641.

New trial orders, see post § 36.
Propriety and duty of allowing reopening, see Equity § 173; Trial, V, B.
Propriety of rehearing in chancery, see Equity § 229 et seq.
Mandamus to compel reopening of chancery cause for further proofs, see also Equity ¶ 717.

¶ 230. While the supreme court will hesitate to act in matters involving the discretion of a circuit judge, a mandamus was issued to compel on proper terms the vacation of an order closing proofs in a chancery case, where it appeared that the issues were important, and ought not to be disposed of without proofs being taken on both sides, and that the failure to take proofs on the part of the relator was due to the illness of one of its solicitors.—Lansing Lumber Co. v. Ingham Circuit Judge, 108 Mich. 305.

Necessity of previous request to compel statement of reasons, see ante ¶ 141.
Necessary allegations in petition, see post ¶ 818.
Sufficiency of record showing against respondent judge, see post § 161.
Rehearing orders and orders reopening proofs, see ante § 35.
Propriety, grounds for, and duty of allowing new trial, see New Trial.

¶ 231. The discretionary power to grant a new trial in the circuit court is not reviewable on mandamus.—People ex rel. Ætna Live Stock Fire & Tornado Ins. Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 20 Mich. 220; People ex rel. Stork v. Detroit Superior Court Judge, 41 Mich. 5.

¶ 232. Mandamus will not be issued to interfere with the discretion—unless it is palpably abused—of the circuit court in refusing or granting a new trial in a civil case.—Detroit Tug & Wrecking Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 75 Mich. 360; Manufacturers' Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. Gratiot Circuit Judge, 79 Mich. 241; Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Genesee Circuit Judge, 89 Mich. 549.

¶ 233. Where the affidavit on a motion for a new trial contains something upon which the circuit judge is called upon to exercise his judgment, it becomes a matter addressed to his discretion, and this court has no authority to issue a mandamus to direct him to rescind his order.—People ex rel. Shimer v. Branch County Circuit Judge, 17 Mich. 67.

¶ 234. The granting or refusing a new trial upon the ground of the jury's misconduct rests in the discretion of the trial judge, and if that discretion is abused mandamus is the proper remedy.—Gray v. Barton, 62 Mich. 186.

¶ 235. Mandamus to vacate an order for a new trial in ejectment for want of notice to the opposite party was denied in the court's discretion.—People ex rel. Dennison v. Genesee Circuit Judge, 37 Mich. 281.

¶ 236. Where a circuit judge set aside a judgment and ordered a new trial on the ground of having discovered, as he supposed, that he had an interest in the case, mandamus to vacate his order was refused.—People ex rel. Alderman v. Montcalm Circuit Judge, 41 Mich. 550.

¶ 237. Mandamus lies to compel a circuit judge to set aside a verdict and grant a new trial because of the jury's communicating and drinking with others after being sent out to consider their verdict.—Churchill v. Alpena Circuit Judge, 56 Mich. 536.

¶ 238. Mandamus lies to compel the granting of a new trial where a default judgment in attachment exceeds the sum sworn as due in the affidavit with interest.—Rose v. Newaygo Circuit Judge, 74 Mich. 332.

¶ 239. Whether mandamus will lie to compel the lower court to give his particular grounds for overruling a motion for a new trial, quære.—Board of Education, City of Grand Rapids v. Brown, 159 Mich. 148.

Discretionary orders, see ante § 28.
Interlocutory orders generally, see post § 38.
Change of venue orders and transfer orders, see post § 39.
Continuance orders and denials, see post § 40.

Compelling vacation of unauthorized order for extension of time for settling bill of exceptions, see post ¶ 401.
Right to and propriety of vacating or otherwise relieving from judgment, see Judgments, V, VI.

¶ 240. The setting aside of judgments is a matter resting in the sound discretion of the circuit judge, and mandamus will not issue to compel him to vacate an order setting aside a judgment unless it appears that he has abused that discretion.—McMillan v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 155 Mich. 651.

¶ 241. Setting aside an irregular judgment may be compelled by mandamus.—People ex rel. Barrett v. Bacon, 18 Mich. 247.

¶ 242. Mandamus lies to compel a circuit judge to set aside a judgment irregularly payment. In 1911, defendants being in default in payment under said agreement, the assignee of complainant in said foreclosure suit filed a petition for a sale of the property under said foreclosure decree. He failed to give notice of the hearing on the petition to defendants. Respondent circuit judge ordered a sale of said premises. Relators, defendants in said foreclosure suit, brought mandamus to compel respondent to vacate said order on the ground that the failure to give notice of the hearing on said petition was jurisdictional. Held, the application for mandamus should be denied, relators' remedy being by appeal if they had any.—Mann v. Ionia Circuit Judge, 169 Mich. 419.

Rights and duties respecting stay or supersedeas, see Stay.

¶ 377. Stay of proceedings will not be compelled by mandamus for a mere irregularity in procedure.—Culver v. Detroit Superior Court Judge, 57 Mich. 25.

¶ 378. Where a court below has denied a motion founded on affidavits to stay proceedings on a judgment on the ground that it has been compromised and paid, and the compromise and payment are denied by the plaintiff, the supreme court will not grant a mandamus to stay proceedings.—People ex rel. Parker v. Calhoun Circuit Judge, 24 Mich. 408.

¶ 379. Mandamus to compel a circuit judge to stay proceedings for the collection of a judgment was denied where it appeared that he had refused the stay on the ground that the judgment had been assigned before the commencement of the proceedings in garnishment, was subject to a lien for attorney's fees, and was not garnishable at law.—Gunzberg v. Kent Circuit Judge, 42 Mich. 591.

¶ 380. Mandamus is the appropriate remedy by which to review the contention that the court erred in refusing to stay execution against the relator, an administrator, individually and personally, pending the final decision on appeal.—Luther v. Kent Circuit Judge, 151 Mich. 71.

Rights of appeal or review by writ of error and duty of trial court preparatory thereto, see Appeal.

Proper remedy for amendment of appeal bond, see Appeal § 88.

Contempt orders to enforce cost allowance, see post ¶ 420.

Review in habeas corpus cases, see post § 58.

¶ 381. Mandamus is not the proper remedy to procure a sufficient appeal bond.—Pulte v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 47 Mich. 646.

Extending time for settlement, see post § 56.

Compelling settlement of bill or case for appeal, see also Appeal § 115.

Mandamus to vacate order extending time to settle bill, see also Appeal ¶ 438.

Compelling amendment of record on appeal, see also Appeal § 244.

Laches and delay as bar to relief, see ante § 23.

Successor of judge as respondent, see post § 131.

Rights and duties of the trial judge, see Appeal, VI.

¶ 382. Mandamus lies to compel the settlement of exceptions properly presented after a trial by the court alone.—People ex rel. Teller v. Littlejohn, 11 Mich. 60.

¶ 383. Mandamus to compel the settlement and signing of a bill of exceptions was granted where the relator had done all in his power to comply with the orders made for its settlement, and had completed and furnished it in due time.—People ex rel. De Moss v. Van Buren Circuit Judge, 41 Mich. 725.

¶ 384. Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel the circuit judge to incorporate in a bill of exceptions the evidence bearing on a point which the judge has charged there was no evidence tending to prove.—People ex rel. Crane v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 24 Mich. 513.

¶ 385. Mandamus lies to compel the amendment by the circuit court of records sent up on error.—Scribner v. Gay, 5 Mich. 511.

¶ 386. Mandamus will not be granted to require a circuit judge to sign a bill of exceptions in proceedings held before him on habeas corpus.—People ex rel. Faust v. Calhoun Circuit Judge, 30 Mich. 266.

¶ 387. A circuit judge will not be required by mandamus to settle and sign a bill of exceptions in the form requested by appellant, where the former is ready to sign and settle such a bill as is warranted by the facts.—Corby v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 186 Mich. 533.

¶ 388. Mandamus will not be granted to compel the adoption of a bill of exceptions tendered for settlement by the party taking the exceptions, if the bill adopted was not essentially defective.—People ex rel. Harbaugh v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 32 Mich. 259.

¶ 389. Where, after many meetings to settle upon a proper bill of exceptions, defendant, who presented the bill, abandoned all but one error assigned, and requested the judge to sign the bill as then presented, which contained only plaintiff's evidence, and the court refused the request, and allowed an amendment proposed by plaintiff, which contained a large part of defendant's testimony, the act of the judge in allowing the amendment, which incorporated matter deemed by him material, was an exercise of judicial discretion, and, no abuse thereof being shown, will not be disturbed by mandamus.—Morgan v. Kent Circuit Judge, 150 Mich. 64.

¶ 390. A circuit judge will not be compelled by mandamus to authenticate a proposed record where it is incomplete and does not properly present the evidence though the adverse party files no amendments or corrections.—Alderson v. Newaygo Circuit Judge, 173 Mich. 608.

¶ 391. Mandamus denied, to compel a trial judge to sign a proposed bill of exceptions which he averred to be incomplete and inaccurate.—Pope v. Judge of Recorder's Court, 107 Mich. 25.

¶ 392. Where an application is made to the circuit court for mandamus to compel an official court stenographer to deliver a transcript of testimony upon the tender or payment of the statutory fees the respondent will be remitted to his legal remedy so far as any disputed charges not provided for by the statute are concerned.—Lyle v. Sherman, 147 Mich. 424.

¶ 393. Mandamus to compel the trial judge to settle and sign a bill of exceptions containing none but plaintiff's evidence, which would have presented the motion of defendant to direct a verdict, will be denied, where the judge included other evidence of defendant and where the propriety of the ruling might be regularly reviewed on writ of error whilst the granting of mandamus would necessarily entail an exhaustive examination of the evidence to determine that relator's contention was tenable.—Morgan v. Kent Circuit Judge, 150 Mich. 64.

¶ 394. The supreme court will not, except where the lower court has abused its discretion, reverse on application for mandamus an order denying an extension of time for appeal.—Roberge v. De Lisle, 158 Mich. 16; De Lisle v. Wayne Circuit Judge, Id.

¶ 395. An order extending the time for settling a case on review beyond four months after a decree will not be set aside on mandamus where it appears that the defendant's delay was due to the inability of the complainant to furnish exhibits.—Weber v. Marquette Circuit Judge, 126 Mich. 69.

¶ 396. Where a motion for a new trial has been denied, and within four days thereafter the party moved for an extension of the time in which to settle his bill of exceptions, and his motion was denied, mandamus will lie to compel the court to grant the extension.—Harper v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 155 Mich. 543.

¶ 397. Where a respondent trial judge has exercised his discretion upon a proper showing, and extended the time for settling a bill of exceptions, the upper court will not review the exercise of his discretion in a mandamus proceeding.—Pettinger v. Montmorency Circuit Judge, 164 Mich. 463.

¶ 398. Mandamus will not lie to compel a circuit judge to vacate an order denying a motion to extend the time for settling a bill of exceptions, where the rules of the court were not observed, and it cannot be said that the denial of the motion constituted an abuse of judicial discretion.—Carrier v. Emmet Circuit Judge, 155 Mich. 344.

¶ 399. Mandamus will not issue to compel the extension of time within which to settle a bill of exceptions, where no formal notice of intention to settle such bill was served within the time limited by the original order of the court, and four of the five defendants in no way consented to any extension or delay.—Carrier v. Emmet Circuit Judge, 155 Mich. 344.

¶ 400. In the absence of a written stipulation extending the time mandamus will not be granted to set aside an order refusing to settle a bill of exceptions after the expiration of the time provided in 1897 C. C. Rule 47.—Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Branch Circuit Judge, 116 Mich. 399.

¶ 401. Mandamus lies to compel the setting aside of an order extending the time to settle a bill of exceptions, where the court extending the time had no authority to do so.—Burgess v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 171 Mich. 583.

Mandamus to compel action to correct return on preliminary examination for crime, see Arrest ¶ 114.

¶ 267. The question as to the court's discretion in entering an order requiring plaintiff in an action for personal injuries to submit to a medical examination before trial will not be reviewed by mandamus, as the question can be raised after judgment by appeal or writ of error.—Hooper v. Hally, 175 Mich. 599.

¶ 268. Mandamus does not lie to compel a circuit judge to suppress a deposition taken in a chancery case; the question should be raised on appeal.—Chandler v. Antrim Circuit Judge, 97 Mich. 621.

¶ 269. Mandamus will not lie to vacate an order for the issue of a commission to take a witness' deposition on a motion for a new trial.—Muskegon Booming Co. v. Muskegon Circuit Judge, 97 Mich. 622.

Grounds and propriety of reference, see Reference.

¶ 270. Mandamus does not lie to review the setting aside of a reference on cause shown.—People ex rel. Taylor v. Osceola Circuit Judge, 30 Mich. 99.

¶ 271. Mandamus lies to compel the circuit court to vacate its action setting aside a referee's report as against the weight of evidence and ordering a new trial.—People ex rel. First Nat. Bank v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 18 Mich. 483.

¶ 272. Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel a circuit judge to set aside his action appointing himself referee in a cause pending before him.—Woodin v. Phoenix, 41 Mich. 655.

¶ 273. Under How. Stat. §§ 7386, 7390, providing for the appointment of auditors when it shall appear that the trial will require investigation of accounts or examination of vouchers, and for their discharge and the appointment of others, etc., the discharge of an auditor is discretionary and not the subject of review by mandamus unless for abuse of such discretion.—Anti-Kalsomine Co. v. Kent Circuit Judge, 123 Mich. 658.

¶ 274. Mandamus does not lie to compel the appointment of commissioners to set off dower, the remedy being by appeal from the order refusing to appoint.—Pulling v. Wayne Probate Judge, 97 Mich. 605.

See also ante ¶ 256.

Mandamus to annul ex parte appointment of receiver for corporation, see also Corporations ¶ 878.

Grounds and propriety and duty of allowing receivership or relief incident thereto, see Receivers.

¶ 275. If the order refusing to appoint a receiver is a final one, an appeal will lie.—Zemon v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 171 Mich. 589.

¶ 276. Mandamus to compel a judge to show cause why a receiver was not appointed as prayed by a judgment creditor's bill is not a proper remedy. Appeal lies.—Zemon v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 171 Mich. 589.

¶ 277. Mandamus will not lie to vacate an order appointing a receiver, whereby the possession of property is divested, as such order is appealable.—Mardian v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 118 Mich. 353.

¶ 278. To warrant interference by mandamus with the decision of a circuit judge confirming the appointment of a receiver upon a motion to vacate the same, it is necessary for the moving party to show some overwhelming objection in point of propriety or some fatal objection upon principle to the person named.—Gypsum Plaster & Stucco Co. v. Kent Circuit Judge, 105 Mich. 497.

¶ 279. Mandamus will not lie, whether an appeal does or not, to review an order for the appointment of a receiver for an assigned estate.—Scott v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 58 Mich. 311.

¶ 280. Mandamus lies to vacate a void order appointing a receiver to manage a corporate business, and granting an interlocutory injunction depriving directors of control.—People ex rel. Port Huron & G. R. Co. v. St. Clair Circuit Judge, 31 Mich. 456.

¶ 281. Mandamus does not lie where there is another adequate remedy at law; and therefore does not lie to compel the circuit court to vacate an order appointing a receiver of a corporation, because such order is appealable.—Pontiac, O. & N. R. Co. v. Oakland Circuit Judge, 142 Mich. 257.

¶ 282. An order dismissing a receiver and discharging the sureties on his bond is reviewable on appeal under section 10890, Comp. L. 1897, and mandamus will not issue to set such order aside.—Wooster v. Calhoun Circuit Judge, 150 Mich. 459.

¶ 283. The duty of the circuit judge to order performance of the duty commanded by Comp. L. 1897, § 6144, that a receiver of a state bank shall "pay over all money so collected or received to the state treasurer," is certain and unambiguous and may be enforced by mandamus, regardless of the inconvenience to the parties or the unwisdom of the legislation.—Moore v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 141 Mich. 398.

Correction of orders denying dissolution or modification, see post § 45.

Compulsion of order to stay waste, see ante ¶ 184.
Occasion and duty to grant injunctions, see Injunctions.

¶ 284. Where in a bill seeking a temporary injunction, the allegations were made on information and belief and without evidence, the order of the lower court denying the bill will not be vacated on mandamus from the supreme court.—Allen v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 159 Mich. 612.

¶ 285. Mandamus will issue to compel a circuit judge to issue an injunction restraining the negotiation of township bonds issued to aid a railroad, contrary to the constitution and decisions of the supreme court, as the refusal of an injunction under such circumstances is not an exercise of discretion in accordance with the law.—Dodge v. Van Buren Circuit Judge, 118 Mich. 189.

¶ 286. Relator, as complainant in a bill in equity, alleged therein that it had acquired a certain right of way for an electric railway; that defendant was proceeding to file a map including twenty-four miles of complainant's road bed with the railroad commission; and that such a course would cause complainant irreparable injury. A temporary injunction was prayed for. Defendant denied some of these allegations in its answer, and set up certain new facts which, if proved, showed complainant not entitled to the relief sought. Upon mandamus to compel the circuit judge to continue a temporary injunction in force, held, since he had not abused his discretion, and relator's rights would be conserved in an appeal on the bill, the writ should be denied.—Grand Rapids Elec. Ry. Co. v. Calhoun Circuit Judge, 156 Mich. 419.

¶ 287. Where a bill for an injunction to restrain the members of a labor union from interfering with the complainants' workmen showed that the members of such union picketed complainants' premises, threatened their employees, and by intimidation and violence sought to prevent them from going to work, and a temporary restraining order had been issued thereon, mandamus lies to compel the circuit judge to set aside an order dissolving such temporary injunction.—Baltic Min. Co. v. Houghton Circuit Judge, 177 Mich. 632.

¶ 288. Relator applied for an injunction to restrain members of a labor union from interfering with his workmen. The affidavits and complaint showed interference with his rights by picketing and by making threats against his employees and by actual violence toward them. Respondent denied the application but suggested that an order to show cause issue, the purpose being to bring members of the union before the court and instruct them as to their duties and thus pour oil upon the troubled waters. Upon an application for a writ of mandamus requiring the judge to issue the injunction, held that the denial of a temporary injunction was an abuse of discretion and writ should be granted.—Ideal Mfg. Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 139 Mich. 92.

¶ 289. On mandamus the exercise of the judicial discretion of the chancellor in refusing to continue an injunction by a stockholder to restrain the issuance of corporate bonds on the ground of their being usurious was not interfered with, as the court could not say that a stockholder was entitled to enjoin a usurious contract, under any and all circumstances as a matter of law.—George N. Fletcher & Sons v. Alpena Circuit Judge, 136 Mich. 511.

¶ 290. Mandamus to compel respondent judge to continue an injunction as originally made was denied, where on a motion for dissolution of the preliminary injunction granted on the application of a stockholder to restrain the issuance of bonds which the corporation had decided to issue to avoid bankruptcy, was the injunction continued but so modified that the bonds drawing six per cent interest might be sold at a price not below 75 cents on the dollar.—George N. Fletcher & Sons v. Alpena Circuit Judge, 136 Mich. 511.

¶ 291. Where a bill to restrain the officers of a foreign corporation from disposing of its property has been dismissed for want of jurisdiction of the court, mandamus does not lie on the ground that if it is not granted the defendant will before the case can be heard on appeal improperly dispose of its assets and leave the relator without remedy, for if the relator has just grounds for his apprehension he may at once appeal, and procure from this court an injunction that will preserve the corporate assets until the appeal is determined.—Hitchcock v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 144 Mich. 362.

¶ 292. The Michigan Railroad Commission put into operation under Act No. 312, Pub. Acts 1907, a certain schedule of rates for carrying excess baggage against the relator railroad. The relator admitted they were not confiscatory, but were remunerative; offered no evidence at the hearings; made no application as provided by the statute, to the commission to change the rates; and took no steps to comply with the commission's order, but pretended that the work of making a new schedule was complicated, when in fact it was simple. The evidence showed that the defendant was operating in Indiana on a schedule lower than the one fixed by the commission. A bill by relator to enjoin temporarily the commission from putting their order into operation was denied by the circuit judge. Held, the circuit judge had not abused his discretion, and mandamus will not lie to compel him to issue the preliminary injunction.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 156 Mich. 459.

¶ 293. Upon the refusal of a circuit judge to grant an injunction under a bill brought to set aside an award, mandamus will not lie to compel him to grant said injunction, where it is not made to appear that the relator will suffer injury if the award is confirmed and where his interests can be protected in the proceedings in equity.—Early v. Ingham Circuit Judge, 166 Mich. 517.

Mandamus to compel modification of injunction issued in aid of creditor's bill, see also Injunctions ¶ 472.

¶ 294. Mandamus will lie to review the action of a circuit judge in granting a preliminary injunction, and in refusing to dissolve the same, where the return shows the question in dispute to be one of law, merely.—Ionia, etc., Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. Ionia Circuit Judge, 100 Mich. 606; Thomas v. Kent Circuit Judge, 116 Mich. 106; Bogert v. Jackson Circuit Judge, 118 Mich. 457; Titus v. Chippewa Circuit Judge, 168 Mich. 507; B. Siegel Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 183 Mich. 145.

¶ 295. Mandamus will not ordinarily issue to compel the dissolution of a preliminary injunction, as the discretion of the court will not be interfered with unless abused.—Briggs v. Wayne Circuit Judges, 118 Mich. 200; B. Siegel Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 183 Mich. 145.

¶ 296. Mandamus lies to vacate an illegal injunction where the party affected thereby would otherwise have to submit to serious injury, or to the risk of proceedings for contempt in disregarding it.—Tawas & B. C. R. Co. v. Iosco Circuit Judge, 44 Mich. 479; Scott v. Chambers, 62 Mich. 532.

¶ 297. The action of a circuit judge in refusing to dissolve a preliminary injunction will not be reviewed on mandamus where there is no exigency requiring immediate action and the case can be heard on its merits without injury to the rights of defendant, unless the court acted entirely without jurisdiction and the question in dispute is solely one of law.—Central Bitulithic Paving Co. v. Manistee Circuit Judge, 132 Mich. 126.

¶ 298. Where an injunction is an abuse of discretion it may in an urgent case be dissolved by mandamus.—City of Detroit v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 79 Mich. 384.

¶ 299. A mandamus to disturb action by a circuit judge in equity—e. g., to compel the dissolution of an injunction—can issue only upon some exigency that requires prompt action to prevent mischief.—Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. v. Newton, 61 Mich. 33.

¶ 300. On an occasion urgent or pressing mandamus may be awarded to dissolve an injunction the granting of which was an abuse of discretion which cannot be justified on legal principles.—City of Detroit v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 79 Mich. 384.

¶ 301. It is only in very plain cases that the supreme court will interfere by mandamus to control the discretion of a circuit judge in granting an injunction.—Stenglein v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 128 Mich. 440.

¶ 302. A preliminary injunction will not be dissolved and set aside on a writ of mandamus where there is no abuse of discretion by the trial court, shown in the petition.—Doud v. Mackinac Circuit Judge, 118 Mich. 96.

¶ 303. Mandamus will not be granted to compel a circuit judge to vacate an order dissolving an injunction, where the return shows that the merits of the question were considered, the supreme court rarely interfering with the discretion of the circuit court in such case.—Kelsey v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 120 Mich. 457.

¶ 304. Where the court below has issued an injunction restraining the erection of a building, and it appears that a final decree, obtained after months of delay, would fall far short of preserving defendant's rights, even if rendered in his favor, mandamus is the proper remedy.—Siegel v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 155 Mich. 459.

¶ 305. Denial of mandamus to compel the circuit judge to vacate an order refusing to dissolve an injunction, where the record showed there was jurisdiction to grant the injunction, was sustained upon the discretion exercised by respondent.—Krolik v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 112 Mich. 486.

¶ 306. An order to show cause on petition for mandamus to the circuit judge to dissolve a preliminary injunction was allowed, where the matter was of public interest and a pending public contract, suspended by the injunction, required prompt decision; though the injunction was rightly granted because the contract was authorized under an unconstitutional law.—Township of Ada v. Kent Circuit Judge, 114 Mich. 77.

¶ 307. Mandamus will not issue to compel a circuit judge to dissolve a temporary injunction on the ground that the bill fails to show any equity on the face of it, where such judge has already denied a motion to dissolve on the same ground, and where an appeal or writ of error would be an adequate remedy, under the circumstances.—Chatfield v. Lenawee Circuit Judge, 140 Mich. 636.

¶ 308. The fact that a bill is multifarious is a mere formal objection which does not entitle the relator to the issuance of a mandamus to compel the dissolution of an injunction.—Village of River Rouge v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 147 Mich. 204.

¶ 309. In mandamus to compel a chancery court of one county in a proceeding to cancel a benefit certificate for fraud, to vacate an order restraining prosecution of an action at law upon the certificate in another county, it is immaterial that the bill failed to allege the state of the pleadings in the law case.—Mactavish v. Kent Circuit Judge, 122 Mich. 242.

¶ 310. Mandamus lies to vacate an injunction where the bill upon which it was granted was devoid of substance, and could not, therefore, support the application for the writ.—Van Norman v. Jackson Circuit Judge, 45 Mich. 204.

¶ 311. An injunction, under an invalid execution upon stock, to prevent the payment of dividends to the owner may be vacated by mandamus.—Van Norman v. Jackson Circuit Judge, 45 Mich. 204.

¶ 312. Mandamus lies to vacate an order made in one court restraining competent proceedings in another court of co-ordinate jurisdiction.—Maclean v. Speed, 52 Mich. 257.

¶ 313. Mandamus is a proper writ to cause dissolution of an injunction against submission of a proposal to county electors to borrow money, where the only question is one of law.—Thomas v. Kent Circuit Judge, 116 Mich. 106.

¶ 314. Mandamus will not lie to control the exercise of the discretionary right of a chancery court in one county in a proceeding to cancel a benefit certificate for fraud, to restrain prosecution of an action at law upon the certificate in another county.—Mactavish v. Kent Circuit Judge, 122 Mich. 242.

¶ 315. Mandamus will not be granted to compel a circuit judge to dissolve an injunction restraining holders of the majority of the stock of a corporation from holding a meeting for the election of a board of directors under the claim that the former election was invalid.—Chiera v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 97 Mich. 688.

¶ 316. Mandamus will lie to vacate a preliminary injunction restraining a board of supervisors from purchasing a site for county buildings, and from issuing bonds in payment therefor, pursuant to a vote of the electors, where the averments of the bill, conceding them to be true, are insufficient to warrant the issue of an injunction.—Wayne County Sup'rs v. Wayne Circuit Judges, 106 Mich. 166.

¶ 317. A motion to dissolve a temporary injunction, restraining the drain commissioner from emptying water on complainant's land, on the ground that the complainant is not the owner in fee as alleged in his bill denied on a finding that the complainant has interests sufficient to entitle him to the injunction will not be disturbed by mandamus, complainant's interest actually being that of a purchaser in possession from a fee owner.—Emery v. Ionia Circuit Judge, 138 Mich. 542.

¶ 318. A railroad filed a bill to restrain defendant from interfering with and obstructing a certain sidetrack. Defendant answered alleging title to the land and asking affirmative relief. The court in an opinion preceding a decree in the case announced that the bill would be dismissed and the temporary injunction, which had been granted, dissolved. Thereafter and without notice to complainant a decree was made as indicated, but which also restrained complainant from going upon or operating trains across the land. Held that the latter part of the decree would not be vacated upon mandamus since the decree was not void nor did it embrace matters not fairly in issue.—Pere Marquette R. Co. v. Kalkaska Circuit Judge, 139 Mich. 436.

¶ 319. A writ of mandamus compelling the vacating of an injunction restraining intrusion upon an office until the right to the office was settled in the proper proceeding would practically be trying the title to such office, and therefore will not issue.—Blain v. Chippewa Circuit Judge, 145 Mich. 59.

¶ 320. One McNichols was appointed township clerk to fill out an unexpired term. Relator and McNichols ran for the office at the election and secured a tie vote. The board of election inspectors cast lots and declared relator elected. The circuit court on a bill by McNichols, enjoined relator from interfering with him in performing the office of township clerk. On mandamus to vacate this order, held, the upper court would not review the lower court's discretion in granting it.—Murphy v. Montmorency Circuit Judge, 159 Mich. 392.

¶ 321, A complainant alleged that he was the owner of land, and that defendant was taking down his fences, entering upon his land, and injuring his sod and clover. A temporary injunction was granted by the lower court. Several points of law were involved in the case respecting the regularity of proceedings for a private highway taken by defendant under Act No. 283, Pub. Acts 1909, and the constitutionality of said statute. The lower court had not passed on the amount of damages due complainant. Held, a writ to vacate the injunction should be denied relator, the defendant in the aforesaid suit. Harbor Springs Lumber Co. v. Emmet Circuit Judge, 160 Mich. 497.

¶ 322. Where the number of saloons in a village is already in excess of the limit prescribed by section 39, Act No. 291, Pub. Acts 1909, an injunction is properly granted against a relator seeking to open a saloon under a license granted by said village, and mandamus will not lie to compel the circuit court issuing such injunction to dissolve the same.—Rohde v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 168 Mich. 683.

¶ 323. If the motion to dissolve a preliminary injunction discloses that material facts are in issue which should be determined only on final hearing, the refusal to dissolve the writ will not be reviewed on mandamus.—B. Siegel Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 183 Mich. 145.

¶ 324. The discretion of the trial court in refusing to dissolve a preliminary injunction prohibiting a lessee from making changes in the exterior walls of a demised building without the lessor's consent as required by the lease will not be reviewed on mandamus, where the question whether the proposed alterations will affect the structural stability of the building or increase the fire risk, were properly questions to be determined on final hearing.—B. Siegel Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 183 Mich. 145.

¶ 325. On bill to restrain the board of election commissioners from printing on the ballots the name of an alleged nominee to fill a vacancy in the office of county prosecuting attorney, whether the circuit court had jurisdiction to grant a temporary injunction as prayed should not be determined by an order requiring the circuit judges to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue requiring them to dissolve the temporary injunction, unless the shortness of time before the ballots must be printed will operate to make the temporary injunction final, in which case there would be no other adequate relief.—Board Election Com'rs Wayne Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judges, 172 Mich. 430.

Orders dismissing injunction bills and petitions, see also ante § 44.
Dismissal of appeal or certiorari from inferior court, see post §§ 61-63.
Occasion and duty to allow discontinuance, dismissal or nonsuit, see Discontinuance, Dismissal and Nonsuit.

¶ 326. Mandamus, it seems, is the most appropriate, if not the only, remedy to review a discontinuance allowed before trial.—Yawkey v. Richardson, 9 Mich. 529.

¶ 327. Mandamus to set aside a nonsuit was granted in a case where a motion to set it aside was denied for nonconformity to practice with leave to renew, where it was so renewed and where court below had refused to consider the merits and denied the renewed motion on reasons relating rather to the public convenience than to the mutual rights of the parties, to open the cause.—Lindsay v. Wayne Circuit Judges, 63 Mich. 735.

¶ 328. In a suit for commissions on the sale of real estate, the court after hearing plaintiff's evidence gave him permission to withdraw a juror and discontinue, and stated that unless he did so the court would direct a verdict for defendant. Plaintiff elected to withdraw a juror. The court ordered an entry that a juror was withdrawn and that plaintiff discontinued his case in open court. Plaintiff contended that he did not agree to a discontinuance. Held, there being a final judgment, plaintiff's proper remedy was by writ of error, and not mandamus to correct the judgment entry.—Meyering v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 164 Mich. 604.

¶ 329. An order made by the trial court dismissing plaintiff's suit on account of failure on her part to give security for costs with a judgment for costs against her is a final judgment reviewable upon writ of error, and mandamus is not the proper remedy.—Craig v. Ingham Circuit Judge, 171 Mich. 33. Same v. Porter, Id.

¶ 330. Appeal and not mandamus is the proper remedy to review a final order dismissing a bill of complaint upon the ground that the court did not have jurisdiction, and in such case appeal is the only remedy.—Hitchcock v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 144 Mich. 362.

¶ 331. Where the circuit court, by its order overruling a motion to quash the service and dismiss the case, retains jurisdiction of the case, the remedy is not by mandamus but by writ of error.—Trumbull Motor Car Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 189 Mich. 554.

¶ 332. Mandamus will not lie to compel a circuit judge to dismiss a bill in equity for lack of jurisdiction, Act No. 310, Pub. Acts 1905, having no application.—Warren v. Lenawee Circuit Judge, 160 Mich. 572; Detroit, T. & I. Ry. v. Same, Id.

¶ 333. Mandamus is not the proper remedy to compel a circuit judge to dismiss gar-nishment proceedings.—Freud v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 125 Mich. 670.

¶ 334. Where a circuit judge, at the end of a divorce suit in which the defendant is served by publication and does not appear at the trial, states that the complainant has made out a ground for divorce, but has failed to acquire jurisdiction of the defendant, mandamus will not lie to compel the judge to sign a particular decree, but the relator's proper remedy is to appeal from the decree dismissing his suit.—Stevens v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 161 Mich. 130.

¶ 335. Mandamus lies to compel the granting of a motion to dismiss a bill for divorce, the oath to which fails to contain the statutory noncollusion clause, made by the defendant after an appearance and answer, and to dissolve a preliminary injunction granted on filing the bill, no motion to amend or order directing an amendment having been made.—Ayres v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 90 Mich. 380.

¶ 336. Mandamus will not issue to review the denial of a motion to dismiss a will contest, where such motion, is in effect, a motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction.—Roberts v. Lenawee Circuit Judge, 140 Mich. 115.

¶ 337. A motion to dismiss a will contest (1) because such contest does not survive the decease of contestant, (2) such suit had not been diligently prosecuted, (3) contestant had failed to obey the order of the supreme court adjudging costs against him, is, in effect, a motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction, and the order thereon cannot be reviewed by mandamus.—Roberts v. Lenawee Circuit Judge, 140 Mich. 115.

¶ 338. On the trial of an action to recover damages for an assault and battery committed in a different county from that in which the parties lived, where the declaration failed to show that the parties lived within the jurisdiction of the court where the venue was laid, and the court upon objection of the defendant to the introduction of evidence on the ground of nonjurisdiction discharged the jury after he had invited the plaintiff to amend to show jurisdiction a mandamus will not issue to compel the setting aside of such order.—Reynolds v. Mecosta Circuit Judge, 148 Mich. 470.

¶ 340. Mandamus was granted to vacate a default entered upon a plea in abatement filed by unauthorized attorneys and to strike the plea from the files.—Arno v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 42 Mich. 362.

¶ 341. Mandamus was granted to set aside judgment taken by default, where affidavit of service of declaration did not state how service was made.—People's Mut. Ben. Soc. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 97 Mich. 627.

¶ 342. Mandamus will not lie to compel a circuit judge to set aside a default and judgment on the ground that under the facts shown the court had no jurisdiction, where the court below asserts and retains jurisdiction, since the question can be determined upon a writ of error.—Valley City Desk Co. v. Kent Circuit Judge, 139 Mich. 194.

¶ 343. Mandamus will not lie to compel a circuit judge to set aside a default, where he has granted a motion to set aside the default and permit the filing of a plea upon condition that defendant appear and plead to the merits, since the court's exercise of discretion will not be interfered with, and defendant can raise the question upon writ of error or case made, if he allows the case to go to judgment.—Hallwood Cash Register Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 139 Mich. 198.

¶ 344. Mandamus is not a proper remedy to require a circuit court to grant a motion to set aside a judgment by default against a garnishee, but the validity of such judgment is determinable on appeal by an examination of the record.—Nichol v. Nevers, 196 Mich. 203.

¶ 345. Mandamus does not lie to review the opening, for alleged errors, of a judgment by default in the circuit court.—People ex rel. Evans v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 39 Mich. 123.

¶ 346. Mandamus lies to vacate the setting aside, on mere motion, of a decree in chancery.—York v. Ingham Circuit Judge, 57 Mich. 421.

¶ 347. Mandamus will be granted to a purchaser of real estate to which title had been quieted before his purchase, requiring the circuit judge to set aside an order vacating the decree quieting the title, where such order was granted without notice to, or knowledge of, such purchaser.—Vincent v. Benzie Circuit Judge, 139 Mich. 90.

¶ 348. Mandamus will not lie to compel the setting aside of an order vacating a decree pro confesso, on substituted service in a suit to quiet title, and allowing interested parties to appear and defend, since chancery practice affords better means for reaching equitable results than are to be found in legal proceedings.—Coffin v. Ontonagon Circuit Judge, 140 Mich. 420.

¶ 349. Mandamus will not lie to compel the setting aside of an order vacating a decree pro confesso, and allowing the grantee of defendant to appear and defend, in a suit to quiet title, though it may appear that the original defendant was not necessarily entitled to appear.—Coffin v. Ontonagon Circuit Judge, 140 Mich. 420.

¶ 350. Mandamus to compel vacation of an order setting aside a default because not made according to proper practice was denied where time remained in which defendant could move to protect his rights and open the default.—Aitken v. Chippewa Circuit Judge, 146 Mich. 129.

¶ 351. Mandamus will issue to compel a judge to vacate an order setting aside a default where the application to set aside was made more than six months after default was entered, in violation of Chancery Rule 7, subd. d.—St. Louis Hoop & Stave Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 155 Mich. 311.

¶ 352. Mandamus does not lie to review the discretion of a court in refusing to reopen a judgment that an affidavit of nonexecution may be supplied.—Chicago & N. E. R. Co. v. Genesee Circuit Judge, 40 Mich. 168.

¶ 353. Mandamus will not lie to compel a circuit judge to set aside an order denying the motion of defendants to set aside their default in not pleading, with leave to plead or demur, where before the time had expired for defendants to plead, they obtained from the court ex parte 10 days further time, but neglected to serve notice of such extension upon plaintiff's attorneys, who duly entered default, defendants, within the 10 days, filing and serving a demurrer, which was stricken from the files by order of the court, and where defendants failed to comply with the rules by filing an affidavit of merits, pleading issuable, and tendering the costs of the default; but defendants may proceed under the rule of practice to set aside the default in 10 days.—Walsh v. Circuit Judge of Wayne County, 76 Mich. 470.

¶ 354. Where a circuit judge in hearing affidavits upon a relator's motion to set aside a default, honestly exercising his judgment, believes defendant's affidavits are untrue, and denies the motion, the upper court will not upon mandamus interfere with his ruling.—Boynton v. Kent Circuit Judge, 163 Mich. 500.

¶ 355. Mandamus will not issue on garnishment proceedings to compel a circuit judge to set aside an order denying the motion of garnishee defendant that the order of default and reference entered against him be vacated.—Gorman v. Calhoun Circuit Judge, 140 Mich. 230.

¶ 356. Entering default and refusing to take it off on the filing of a plea in abatement to the jurisdiction of the court over the person of the garnishee defendant, pleaded by attorney, and not in proper person, because such was deemed to constitute an appearance in garnishment proceedings whereby the jurisdiction of the court is admitted, will not be remedied by mandamus to compel vacation of the judgment and the default.—Gorman v. Calhoun Circuit Judge, 140 Mich. 230.

Grounds and duty of allowing or awarding costs, see Costs.

¶ 357. Mandamus is the settled method of reviewing the taxation of costs.—Townsend v. Jackson Circuit Judge, 157 Mich. 231.

¶ 358. Without deciding whether or not error is the proper remedy to review a retaxation of costs by the circuit court, mandamus was awarded to vacate a taxation of costs, the court stating that it has been the common practice to proceed by mandamus in cases of taxation of costs.—Schmidt v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 136 Mich. 658.

¶ 359. Mandamus rather than writ of error is the proper remedy to review the retaxation of costs made by a circuit judge in proceedings removed from the probate court before him.—Patterson v. Calhoun Circuit Judge, 144 Mich. 416.

¶ 360. Mandamus will not be granted to compel a circuit judge to vacate an order disallowing costs on the dismissal of an order in chancery, on the technical claim that the practice prescribed by rule had not been followed, where the return is an ample justification for the denial of costs.—O'Brien v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 131 Mich. 67.

¶ 361. Appeal, and not mandamus, is the proper remedy where a motion to vacate a decree as to the solicitors' fees awarded therein, is denied.—Wood v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 150 Mich. 71.

¶ 362. Error in rendering judgment for costs against an administrator personally cannot be reviewed by mandamus.—In re Colburn's Estate, 153 Mich. 206; More v. Luther, Id.

¶ 363. An order for costs on opening a default is discretionary, and an order to show cause why it should not be vacated will not be granted.—People ex rel. Miller v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 89 Mich. 375.

¶ 364. Mandamus will not lie to vacate an order granting costs to defendant in an action for trespass to lands on plaintiff's recovering judgment for less than $100, such order being a final judgment reviewable by writ of error.—Haney v. Muskegon Circuit Judge, 101 Mich. 392.

¶ 365. Mandamus will lie to vacate an order allowing a sheriff's claim for compensation as custodian of attached property.—Fletcher v. Kalkaska Circuit Judge, 81 Mich. 186.

¶ 366. Mandamus lies to compel a circuit judge to consider a coroner's account for fees and expenses incident to an inquest upon the view of the dead body of a stranger, and, if satisfied that the account is correct, to indorse his order of allowance thereon.—Locke v. Speed, 62 Mich. 408.

¶ 367. Mandamus will not lie at the instance of a county clerk to compel the circuit judge to vacate an order providing for the filing of a certificate of deposit with the clerk as security for costs in lieu of a bond, since the form of the security rests in the sound discretion of the court.—Smith v. Kent Circuit Judge, 139 Mich. 463.

Summary order as adequate remedy to control or recall files and records of court, see Courts ¶ 9.

Power and duty of court respecting records, see Judgments, III; Records.

¶ 368. Mandamus lies, upon a seasonable application, to compel correction of an erroneous journal entry of judgment.—Frederick v. Mecosta Circuit Judge, 52 Mich. 529.

¶ 369. Mandamus to compel nunc pro tunc entry of a record of an election against a testamentary provision for a ward by the guardian was denied, where it appeared that in another way there had been a legally sufficient record of the election.—Bassett v. Durfee, 87 Mich. 167.

¶ 370. Whether the entry of a nunc pro tunc judgment against the principal debtor in garnishment proceedings as of the date of a motion by a garnishee defendant to set aside a default against him affects the latter's motion is a question which cannot be reviewed in mandamus proceedings but must be reviewed upon error from the judgment.—Travelers' Ins. Co. of Hartford v. Kent Circuit Judge, 144 Mich. 687.

Denial of mandamus to vacate order setting aside execution sale because want of notice of the motion was immaterial to relator, see also Executions ¶ 270.

¶ 371. Where the supreme court has entered an unambiguous decree in favor of relator for a definite sum of money, mandamus will lie to compel the circuit judge to issue an execution to collect the same.—Gaskill v. Jackson Circuit Judge, 159 Mich. 472.

¶ 372. Mandamus to vacate an order setting aside an execution sale after the time for redemption had expired was denied in the discretion of the court.—Stinton v. Kent Circuit Judge, 37 Mich. 286; Wilkie v. Ingham County Circuit Judge, 52 Mich. 641.

¶ 373. Mandamus to compel a circuit court to grant relator's motion for a resale upon execution will not issue unless the case made on the motion at the circuit was such as to show a plain legal right.—People ex rel. McCarthy v. Monroe Circuit Judge, 36 Mich. 274.

¶ 374. The supreme court will not, by mandamus, at the instance of a judgment creditor, vacate an order of the circuit judge setting aside a sheriff's return nulla bona on an execution, where the evidence on which such return was set aside would, if believed, show the return not to have been in accordance with the facts.—William Wright Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 109 Mich. 139.

To compel quashal or obtain relief from writ of assistance, see ante ¶ 198.

Rights and duties respecting foreclosure sales, see Foreclosure.

¶ 375. Mandamus was awarded to compel postponement of a foreclosure sale where it appeared that a year had not yet elapsed from the time part of the defendants were served with notice and appeared in the case, and also that by reason of the pendency of certain suits, the property could not sell to advantage until the disposition of such suits.—Roberts v. Kalamazoo Circuit Judge, 122 Mich. 560.

¶ 376. A decree of foreclosure of a mortgage was taken by default in 1903, defendants appearing but not answering. An arrangement was then made to extend time of payment. In 1911, defendants being in default in payment under said agreement, the assignee of complainant in said foreclosure suit filed a petition for a sale of the property under said foreclosure decree. He failed to give notice of the hearing on the petition to defendants. Respondent circuit judge ordered a sale of said premises. Relators, defendants in said foreclosure suit, brought mandamus to compel respondent to vacate said order on the ground that the failure to give notice of the hearing on said petition was jurisdictional. Held, the application for mandamus should be denied, relators' remedy being by appeal if they had any.—Mann v. Ionia Circuit Judge, 169 Mich. 419.

Rights and duties respecting stay or supersedeas, see Stay.

¶ 377. Stay of proceedings will not be compelled by mandamus for a mere irregularity in procedure.—Culver v. Detroit Superior Court Judge, 57 Mich. 25.

¶ 378. Where a court below has denied a motion founded on affidavits to stay proceedings on a judgment on the ground that it has been compromised and paid, and the compromise and payment are denied by the plaintiff, the supreme court will not grant a mandamus to stay proceedings.—People ex rel. Parker v. Calhoun Circuit Judge, 24 Mich. 408.

¶ 379. Mandamus to compel a circuit judge to stay proceedings for the collection of a judgment was denied where it appeared that he had refused the stay on the ground that the judgment had been assigned before the commencement of the proceedings in garnishment, was subject to a lien for attorney's fees, and was not garnishable at law.—Gunzberg v. Kent Circuit Judge, 42 Mich. 591.

¶ 380. Mandamus is the appropriate remedy by which to review the contention that the court erred in refusing to stay execution against the relator, an administrator, individually and personally, pending the final decision on appeal.—Luther v. Kent Circuit Judge, 151 Mich. 71.

Successor of judge as respondent, see post § 131.

¶ 382. Mandamus lies to compel the settlement of exceptions properly presented after a trial by the court alone.—People ex rel. Teller v. Littlejohn, 11 Mich. 60.

¶ 383. Mandamus to compel the settlement and signing of a bill of exceptions was granted where the relator had done all in his power to comply with the orders made for its settlement, and had completed and furnished it in due time.—People ex rel. De Moss v. Van Buren Circuit Judge, 41 Mich. 725.

¶ 384. Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel the circuit judge to incorporate in a bill of exceptions the evidence bearing on a point which the judge has charged there was no evidence tending to prove.—People ex rel. Crane v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 24 Mich. 513.

¶ 385. Mandamus lies to compel the amendment by the circuit court of records sent up on error.—Scribner v. Gay, 5 Mich. 511.

¶ 386. Mandamus will not be granted to require a circuit judge to sign a bill of exceptions in proceedings held before him on habeas corpus.—People ex rel. Faust v. Calhoun Circuit Judge, 30 Mich. 266.

¶ 387. A circuit judge will not be required by mandamus to settle and sign a bill of exceptions in the form requested by appellant, where the former is ready to sign and settle such a bill as is warranted by the facts.—Corby v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 186 Mich. 533.

¶ 388. Mandamus will not be granted to compel the adoption of a bill of exceptions tendered for settlement by the party taking the exceptions, if the bill adopted was not essentially defective.—People ex rel. Harbaugh v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 32 Mich. 259.

¶ 389. Where, after many meetings to settle upon a proper bill of exceptions, defendant, who presented the bill, abandoned all but one error assigned, and requested the judge to sign the bill as then presented, which contained only plaintiff's evidence, and the court refused the request, and allowed an amendment proposed by plaintiff, which contained a large part of defendant's testimony, the act of the judge in allowing the amendment, which incorporated matter deemed by him material, was an exercise of judicial discretion, and, no abuse thereof being shown, will not be disturbed by mandamus.—Morgan v. Kent Circuit Judge, 150 Mich. 64.

¶ 390. A circuit judge will not be compelled by mandamus to authenticate a proposed record where it is incomplete and does not properly present the evidence though the adverse party files no amendments or corrections.—Alderson v. Newaygo Circuit Judge, 173 Mich. 608.

¶ 391. Mandamus denied, to compel a trial judge to sign a proposed bill of exceptions which he averred to be incomplete and inaccurate.—Pope v. Judge of Recorder's Court, 107 Mich. 25.

¶ 392. Where an application is made to the circuit court for mandamus to compel an official court stenographer to deliver a transcript of testimony upon the tender or payment of the statutory fees the respondent will be remitted to his legal remedy so far as any disputed charges not provided for by the statute are concerned.—Lyle v. Sherman, 147 Mich. 424.

¶ 393. Mandamus to compel the trial judge to settle and sign a bill of exceptions containing none but plaintiff's evidence, which would have presented the motion of defendant to direct a verdict, will be denied, where the judge included other evidence of defendant and where the propriety of the ruling might be regularly reviewed on writ of error whilst the granting of mandamus would necessarily entail an exhaustive examination of the evidence to determine that relator's contention was tenable.—Morgan v. Kent Circuit Judge, 150 Mich. 64.

¶ 394. The supreme court will not, except where the lower court has abused its discretion, reverse on application for mandamus an order denying an extension of time for appeal.—Roberge v. De Lisle, 158 Mich. 16; De Lisle v. Wayne Circuit Judge, Id.

¶ 395. An order extending the time for settling a case on review beyond four months after a decree will not be set aside on mandamus where it appears that the defendant's delay was due to the inability of the complainant to furnish exhibits.—Weber v. Marquette Circuit Judge, 126 Mich. 69.

¶ 396. Where a motion for a new trial has been denied, and within four days thereafter the party moved for an extension of the time in which to settle his bill of exceptions, and his motion was denied, mandamus will lie to compel the court to grant the extension.—Harper v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 155 Mich. 543.

¶ 397. Where a respondent trial judge has exercised his discretion upon a proper showing, and extended the time for settling a bill of exceptions, the upper court will not review the exercise of his discretion in a mandamus proceeding.—Pettinger v. Montmorency Circuit Judge, 164 Mich. 463.

¶ 398. Mandamus will not lie to compel a circuit judge to vacate an order denying a motion to extend the time for settling a bill of exceptions, where the rules of the court were not observed, and it cannot be said that the denial of the motion constituted an abuse of judicial discretion.—Carrier v. Emmet Circuit Judge, 155 Mich. 344.

¶ 399. Mandamus will not issue to compel the extension of time within which to settle a bill of exceptions, where no formal notice of intention to settle such bill was served within the time limited by the original order of the court, and four of the five defendants in no way consented to any extension or delay.—Carrier v. Emmet Circuit Judge, 155 Mich. 344.

¶ 400. In the absence of a written stipulation extending the time mandamus will not be granted to set aside an order refusing to settle a bill of exceptions after the expiration of the time provided in 1897 C. C. Rule 47.—Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Branch Circuit Judge, 116 Mich. 399.

¶ 401. Mandamus lies to compel the setting aside of an order extending the time to settle a bill of exceptions, where the court extending the time had no authority to do so.—Burgess v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 171 Mich. 583.

Proper officer to disperse assemblages and make arrests, see also post ¶ 517.

¶ 402. While a writ of mandamus will issue commanding a public official to perform a specific ministerial act, it does not lie against officials to compel the enforcement of the criminal law by obtaining complaint for its violation and by arrest, it being a discretionary executive power, and not subject to the control of the courts except in cases of gross and manifest abuse. (Per Brooke, J., Montgomery, Hooker and McAlvay, JJ., concurring; Blair, C. J., Ostrander and Montgomery, JJ., concurring in the result; Grant, J., dissenting.)—Gowan v. Smith, 157 Mich. 443.

¶ 403. A justice of the peace must entertain a complaint and issue a warrant on application where one is charged with selling intoxicating liquors without a license in violation of a city ordinance, and on his refusal and mandamus the question of the unreasonableness of the ordinance cannot be considered, especially where it does not appear that the person against whom a warrant is sought has ever made any application for a license or tendered the license fee.—Wells v. Torrey, 144 Mich. 689.

¶ 404. Mandamus to compel respondent justice of the peace to issue a warrant for violation of a municipal ordinance requiring license for saloons, and making no distinction between those where intoxicants are sold and those selling only nonintoxicants, should be denied where it appears that the amount of the license is excessive as applied to the latter class of saloons.—Kenaston v. Riker, 146 Mich. 163, Hooker and Grant, JJ., concurring on the ground that the writ ought not to issue to try the validity of an ordinance in view of the fact that there were other justices to whom application for the warrant might have been made.

¶ 405. Mandamus lies to review the quashing of an indictment and to compel the trial of a criminal cause.—People ex rel. Robison v. Swift, 59 Mich. 529.

¶ 406. The proper remedy to secure the reversal of an order quashing an information is by writ of mandamus.—Hoffman v. Allegan Circuit Judge, 150 Mich. 58.

¶ 407. Mandamus will not lie to have the court in advance of the final determination of a case review the action of a circuit judge in refusing to quash an indictment.—Maynard v. Ingram Circuit Judge, 124 Mich. 465.

¶ 408. An information for forgery of a check was quashed, on the ground that the check being dated on Sunday was void and not a subject for forgery, and accused was remanded to the custody of the sheriff for 24 hours to allow the prosecuting attorney to file a new information. He thereupon swore to a complaint charging the obtaining of money by false pretenses by means of the same check, and accused was bound over for trial. The prosecuting attorney thereafter made a motion to vacate the order quashing the indictment which was denied, and he brought mandamus to compel the vacation. Held that since the accused had been bound over for trial, and the prosecutor had acquiesced in the court's action by causing him to be so bound over, and because the motion to vacate was oral, informal and ex parte and without notice to accused, mandamus would be denied without considering the question of the legal sufficiency of the information for uttering the forged check.—Louisell v. Benzie Circuit Judge, 139 Mich. 40.

¶ 409. Mandamus to vacate an order quashing an information for the sale of intoxicating liquors, on the ground that the information charged no crime, will be denied where the court is equally divided as to the sufficiency of the information, it containing no averment that the defendant had not given a retailer's bond, and no averment that he had given a bond authorizing him to sell liquor for medicinal purposes.—Peters v. Eaton Circuit Judge, 153 Mich. 467.

¶ 410. Mandamus may be granted to compel return of record from recorder's court to Wayne circuit court so that defendant may plead in abatement to indictment.—Lauder v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 79 Mich. 602.

¶ 411. Mandamus will not issue to compel the circuit judge to try information for alleged breach of peace in a case of private trespass where a civil action would lie.—Ware v. Branch Circuit Judge, 75 Mich. 488.

¶ 412. Mandamus will not lie to compel a circuit judge to try an information for an alleged "breach of the peace," charged to have been committed by the use of foul, abusive and insulting language in a dwelling-house, in the presence of the occupants, but accompanied with no threat, and causing no expectation or fear of personal violence.—Ware v. Branch Circuit Judge, 75 Mich. 488.

¶ 413. The supreme court will not review by mandamus proceedings an interlocutory order of a circuit judge denying a motion to dismiss criminal proceedings.—Hosford v. Gratiot Circuit Judge, 129 Mich. 302.

¶ 414. Where, upon a motion for change of venue in a criminal case, most of the showing made would apply to all of the populous counties in the state, and the showing of actual prejudice is met by counter-affidavits, which call for the exercise of the sound judgment and discretion of the circuit judge, his conclusion will not be disturbed by the supreme court upon application for a writ of mandamus, except in a case of a clear abuse of discretion.—Glazier v. Ingham Circuit Judge, 153 Mich. 481.

¶ 414a. The granting of a change of venue at the request of the prosecution and against the protest of accused may be reviewed by mandamus, where it was arbitrary and was made without any effort to learn whether a jury might be obtained.—Glinnan v. Detroit Recorder's Court Judge, 173 Mich. 674.

Right to habeas corpus and general law thereof, see Habeas Corpus.

Mandamus to vacate habeas corpus order where defects are not remediable, see also Habeas Corpus ¶ 69.

Proper mode of reviewing habeas corpus decisions, see Habeas Corpus.

¶ 415. Where a circuit judge has jurisdiction, his order in habeas corpus proceedings discharging a prisoner confined in the state prison under a void sentence cannot be reviewed by mandamus.—Ellis, Attorney General v. Daboll, Jackson Circuit Judge, 90 Mich. 272.

¶ 416. Mandamus will not be granted to vacate an order made in habeas corpus proceedings where, from the whole record, it is apparent that such defects exist in the proceedings under which the defendants were held in custody as would, upon a new writ, justify their discharge.—Township of Fruitport v. Muskegon Circuit Judge, 90 Mich. 20.

¶ 417. Mandamus will issue to compel a circuit judge to proceed with a hearing and allow presentation of proofs upon a writ of habeas corpus by a father to determine the right of custody of his child who had been intrusted to other relatives of the child in prior habeas corpus proceedings, where the petition alleges that those having custody of the child have refused to allow him to see the child except on their own premises and are continually prejudicing the child against the father.—Martin v. Benzie Circuit Judge, 200 Mich. 549.

See also ante ¶ 254.

Remedy in trial court as adequate substitute for mandamus to compel attachment for contempt, see ante ¶ 161.

General law of contempt and powers and disabilities of courts therein, see Contempt.

Mandamus to review action of judge on citation of witness for refusal to answer on deposition, see also Depositions ¶¶ 33, 34.

¶ 418. Mandamus will not lie to quash contempt proceedings while pending.—Toepel v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 138 Mich. 302.

¶ 419. An order by a police judge adjudging the city controller in contempt on refusal to return papers and files which are being investigated by the city council is reviewable on mandamus.—Schwartz v. Barry, 90 Mich. 267.

¶ 420. Mandamus does not lie to vacate an order of a circuit judge convicting a party of contempt for refusing to pay the costs awarded against him on a continuance; certiorari is the proper remedy.—Love v. St. Clair Circuit Judge, 97 Mich. 625.

¶ 421. Mandamus will lie to review the decision of a circuit judge quashing proceedings for contempt, commenced before his predecessor in office, on the ground of a want of jurisdiction to try the question of fact involved.—Montgomery v. Muskegon Circuit Judge, 100 Mich. 436.

¶ 422. Mandamus will lie to review an order adjudging relator guilty of contempt of court and ordering him to pay a certain sum within 10 days or be imprisoned, since the remedy by appeal in such case is not sufficiently expeditious.—Dillon v. Shiawassee Circuit Judge, 131 Mich. 574.

¶ 423. Where a defendant in a divorce proceeding is ordered to pay "necessary court expenses and witness fees as they accrue" and is adjudged in contempt of court for nonpayment, the order is not so invalid, as being indefinite, as to authorize the supreme court to issue a writ of mandamus to compel the judge to set aside the contempt order.—Lake v. Houghton Circuit Judge, 172 Mich. 660.

¶ 424. The supreme court will not issue a writ of mandamus to compel a judge to set aside an order adjudging a defendant in a divorce proceeding guilty of contempt for noncompliance with an order for temporary alimony and court expenses, on the ground the contempt proceedings are irregular and void, where irregularities in the proceedings were waived by being urged on a motion to set aside the contempt order, and other objections are not jurisdictional.—Lake v. Houghton Circuit Judge, 172 Mich. 660.

¶ 425. A defendant in divorce proceedings was ordered to pay temporary alimony and court expenses and on nonpayment an order to show cause why he should not be adjudged in contempt was not answered. The defendant's attorney pleaded ignorance of the latter order, but the court announced that a contempt order would be prepared. In leaving the bench the judge stated that an answer might be filed, which was done but was inadequate, and the contempt order was signed. Held, the determination of the defendant's guilt was not extra-judicial and would not authorize the supreme court to issue a writ of mandamus to compel the judge to set aside the contempt order.—Lake v. Houghton Circuit Judge, 172 Mich. 660.

for the nonpayment of alimony so as to authorize a writ of mandamus against a circuit judge denying a motion to set aside an order denying such writ of attachment is not shown where the amended decree, which forms the basis for an order, was filed in a prior dismissed case between the same parties by mistake, and, after the filing of the petition for attachment, an amended decree is filed in the second case and relator fails to renew her application for an attachment based upon the amended record.—Dwyer v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 197 Mich. 888.

¶ 427. The relator in a previous suit by bill had alleged that, by fraud and false representations, the defendant in that suit had obtained $10,000. The court found with the complainant, and that the said defendants had $7,000 in their hands of the said funds, and ordered the defendants to pay it over. Relator brings this mandamus proceeding to compel the circuit judge to hold those defendants in contempt for failure to pay. Held, the decree of the circuit judge did not mean that the defendants had a specific fund of $7,000 in hand, but simply that they were indebted in breach of trust for that sum to the relator, and the writ is denied.—Mast v. Washtenaw Circuit Judge, 154 Mich. 485.

¶ 428. Mandamus is not the proper remedy to review an order suspending from practice an attorney-at-law.—Underwood v. Newaygo Circuit Judge, 97 Mich. 626.

¶ 429. Relator, the publisher of a newspaper, published an article intimating a suspicion that the officer in charge of the jury sitting upon a case in respondent judge's court had tampered with the jury. Respondent ordered relator to submit under oath in open court the facts upon which he based his article. Relator offered to submit such facts in private to the court in the presence of the officer, which offer the court refused. Held, mandamus should lie to compel the respondent to vacate the order as one beyond the power of the court.—Warren v. Connolly, 165 Mich. 274.

Cases appealed from boards and quasi-judicial officers, see post § 62.
Probate appeals, see post § 68.
Mandamus to vacate order allowing belated appeal from justice's court, see also Justices of the Peace ¶ 809.

¶ 430. Mandamus is the proper remedy to correct an order of the circuit that dismisses an appeal from a justice on the ground that the latter's decision was not a judgment, and therefore not appealable; a return to a writ of error would not regularly disclose all the proceedings on the motion to dismiss or the grounds of the dismissal.—People ex rel. Comstock v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 30 Mich. 98.

¶ 431. Mandamus is the proper remedy where an appeal has been improperly dismissed for defects in the bond and affidavit.—People ex rel. Detroit & B. Plank Road Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 27 Mich. 303.

¶ 432. Under the rule that mandamus will not lie where a writ of error is available, mandamus cannot be used to review an order dismissing an appeal from a justice court even though judgment has not been entered, as judgment would have been entered on the plaintiff's motion and error would then lie.—Detroit, G. R. & W. R. Co. v. Eaton Circuit Judge, 128 Mich. 495.

¶ 433. Mandamus does not lie to compel a circuit judge to vacate an order dismissing an appeal from the judgment of a circuit court commissioner, a writ of error being plaintiff's relief.—Lemon v. Oakland Circuit Judge, 140 Mich. 540.

¶ 734. Mandamus is the proper writ by which to review an order of the circuit judge denying leave to take a special appeal from a judgment rendered by a justice of the peace.—Graham v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 145 Mich. 360.

¶ 435. Mandamus is not the appropriate remedy to review the action of the circuit judge in allowing a delayed appeal from a justice's court, inasmuch as such ruling may be reviewed by a writ of error.—Cosgrove v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 144 Mich. 682.

¶ 436. On mandamus a circuit judge will be compelled to vacate an order allowing an appeal from a justice court granted eleven days after judgment, in the absence of any statement in the affidavit that the appellant was prevented from applying within the five days as required under Comp. L. 1897, § 909.—Stanton v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 126 Mich. 715.

¶ 437. Mandamus will not lie to review the jurisdiction of a circuit judge in entering an order allowing a dilatory appeal from a justice's court, since the aggrieved party has a remedy by writ of error.—Mikkola v. Houghton Circuit Judge, 165 Mich. 583.

¶ 438. Where the circuit court in its discretion refuses to assume jurisdiction of an appeal from a justice court after the lapse of five days from the entry of the judgment, mandamus and not error is the proper method for review.—Huddleston v. Charles Amos & Co., 180 Mich. 253.

¶ 439. Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel a circuit court to take jurisdiction and try a case on appeal from the justice's court where the party appealing desires to retry the issues determined in the justice's court and affidavits are required in the supreme court to show that error, if any, was committed.—American Boat Co. v. St. Clair Circuit Judge, 194 Mich. 146.

¶ 440. Mandamus is a proper remedy to compel a circuit judge to dismiss a common law writ of certiorari for the review of a decision of a justice of the peace, where the party obtaining the writ has ignored the remedy provided by statute.—Jacobs v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 132 Mich. 55.

¶ 441. Where, in a proceeding to compel a return to an alleged appeal from a justice's judgment, the circuit judge has determined that the justice has waived payment of the fee for making return, this decision is conclusive and cannot be reversed on mandamus or certiorari, if any facts stated by the justice tend to establish it; otherwise it seems that the court's order compelling a return may be vacated by mandamus.—People ex rel. Wiley v. Allegan Circuit Judge, 29 Mich. 487.

¶ 442. Mandamus will not lie to compel a circuit judge to set aside an order for an amended return by a justice in an appeal case, which, when made, shows that the jury fees have not been paid by the appellant, and a subsequent order dismissing the appeal unless such fees are paid.—Swarthout v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 99 Mich. 347.

¶ 443. An ordinance regulating the licensing of saloons, provided that if a saloonkeeper should be convicted within one year of a violation of the ordinance and of "the state law," his license might be revoked. The petitioner, a saloonkeeper, was so convicted, except that the state law violated was not the law controlling the sale of liquor, and his license was revoked. He appealed by certiorari to the circuit court to set aside the order of the common council. The circuit court held that aside from the question of the convictions, the council had discretion to revoke the license. Held, this ruling was not conclusive on the petitioner in mandamus, and the supreme court might review the question as to whether the violations proved against the petitioner were those spoken of in the ordinance.—Cox v. Jackson Common Council, 152 Mich. 630.

¶ 444. Relator brought certiorari to have the proceedings of a highway commissioner reviewed by respondent circuit judge. Respondent decided the case on the merits, and declined to reverse the holdings of the commissioner. Held, the relator's proper remedy to review the decision of respondent was by writ of error, not by mandamus.—Harts v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 164 Mich. 35.

Eminent domain appeal cases, see post § 66.
Correction of order dismissing will contest, see ante ¶¶ 336, 337.

¶ 445. Mandamus lies to require a circuit judge to hear an appeal by executors from an order of the probate court disallowing a will.—Cheever v. Washtenaw Circuit Judge, 45 Mich. 6.

¶ 446. Where the petition for a probate appeal after time is sufficient to call for the circuit judge's judgment whether petitioner has been in default, and whether justice requires review, such judgment will not be disturbed on mandamus.—Sanborn v. St. Clair Circuit Judge, 94 Mich. 519.

¶ 447. Where an administrator appealed from an order of the probate court removing him, and the court fixed his bond at an unwarranted figure upon an erroneous conception of the law, he may proceed, by mandamus, to compel the probate judge to approve a proper bond though no proper bond had been presented for approval.—Fleming v. Ottawa Probate Judge, 137 Mich. 139.

¶ 448. Mandamus will not lie to compel a circuit judge to vacate an order allowing, after the statutory time, an appeal from an order of the probate court under How. St. § 6784, where the petition for leave to appeal sets forth facts sufficient to call for the exercise of the discretion of the court, and where such discretion has been exercised.—Sanborn v. St. Clair Circuit Judge, 94 Mich. 519.

¶ 449. Except in clear cases of abuse the discretion of the circuit court in denying an application for leave to appeal from the report of commissioners on claims disallowing a claim against a defendant's estate will not be reviewed on mandamus.—Smith v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 82 Mich. 93.

¶ 450. Mandamus to compel the circuit judge to dismiss an appeal from the probate court on the ground that the party making the appeal had no right to do so does not lie, inasmuch as such an order may be reviewed by a writ of error after final judgment.—Sharp v. Montcalm Circuit Judge, 144 Mich. 328.

¶ 451. Where the circuit court dismissed an appeal from the probate court, because an appeal had not been authorized, on mandamus to compel the setting aside the order, it is held that a writ of error will bring before the court everything essential to a proper determination of the alleged error of the trial court.—City of Flint v. Genesee Circuit Judge, 146 Mich. 439.

¶ 452. Mandamus will not issue to compel a circuit judge to vacate an order denying a dilatory appeal from an order of the probate court allowing the final account of an executor. The order of the circuit judge was a final order, reviewable upon error, and therefore not a proper subject of mandamus proceedings.—Small v. Cheboygan Circuit Judge, 150 Mich. 6.

¶ 453. Mandamus lies to compel a circuit judge to dismiss an appeal from a probate order for an oral examination.—Palmer v. Jackson Circuit Judge, 90 Mich. 1.

¶ 454. Mandamus does not lie to compel a circuit judge to vacate an order reinstating an appeal from the probate court.—Gifford v. Washtenaw Circuit Judge, 189 Mich. 546.

¶ 455. Mandamus will not lie to compel a circuit judge to reinstate an appeal on behalf of one claiming to be purchaser at a probate sale, who does not show that he has tendered payment and performance so as to entitle himself to the rights of a purchaser.—People ex rel. Monroe v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 19 Mich. 296.

¶ 456. Mandamus denied to compel a circuit judge to vacate an order dismissing the appeal of an incompetent person from the order of the probate court denying his application for a discharge from guardianship, where it appears that the citation was directed to the guardian, mother, two sisters, and wife of the incompetent, all of whom, except the wife, resided in this state, and the files in the probate court fail to show service, either actual or constructive, upon the wife and one of the sisters.—Storms v. Allegan Circuit Judge, 99 Mich. 144.

¶ 457. Mandamus to compel the entry of judgment upon a verdict "for the full value of the estate" upon an appeal from the probate court was denied; as the testimony as to the value of the estate differed from the appraisal, and it could not be said whether the jury had in mind a verdict for the full value of the estate regardless of the debts and expenses of administration, or for an amount equal to the value of the estate after the payment of expenses and debts, other than the relator's claim.—Long v. Wayne Cir. Judge, 136 Mich. 12.

¶ 458. The fact that the circuit court in sustaining on appeal a claim allowed by commissioners against the estate rendered judgment against relator as administrator for the amount of the damages, and against him personally for the amount of the costs, if error, is one which can be reviewed by writ of error, and will not be reviewed by mandamus.—Luther v. Kent Circuit Judge, 151 Mich. 71.

¶ 459. The error of the circuit court, if any, in reviewing by certiorari and not by appeal the order of the probate court whereby allowance was made to one not the widow of a decedent, is reviewable by ordinary procedure in the supreme court; and therefore mandamus will not issue.—Reed v. St. Clair Circuit Judge, 122 Mich. 153.

¶ 460. Mandamus will not lie to compel a circuit judge to set aside, on the ground of alleged want of jurisdiction, his order reversing, on certiorari, an order of the probate court granting statutory allowance to a widow; the action of the judge being reviewable by appeal or writ of error.—Reed v. St. Clair Circuit Judge, 122 Mich. 153.

¶ 461. Mandamus does not lie to compel a probate judge to vacate an order admitting a will to probate. The remedy by appeal is adequate.—Corby v. Wayne Probate Judge, 96 Mich. 11.

¶ 462. Mandamus will not lie to review the refusal of a probate court to grant letters of administration on an intestate's estate.—People ex rel. Campau v. St. Joseph County Probate Judge, 36 Mich. 500.

¶ 463. This court will not review upon petition for mandamus, the conclusion of a probate judge upon the question whether or not the person appointed by him as administrator was a proper person for such appointment.—McMeekin v. Saginaw Probate Judge, 150 Mich. 354.

¶ 464. Mandamus is not the proper remedy to review an order of the probate court refusing to remove an administrator.—American Missionary Ass'n v. Hall, 138 Mich. 247.

¶ 465. Mandamus will not lie to compel the probate judge to vacate an interlocutory order sustaining a demurrer to an application for discovery of assets.—Mitchell v. Bay Probate Judge, 155 Mich. 550.

¶ 466. It is discretionary with the probate judge whether he will hear and adjudicate upon claims; he cannot be required by mandamus to do so.—People ex rel. United States Attorney v. Monroe County Probate Judge, 16 Mich. 204.

¶ 467. Appeal and not mandamus is the proper remedy to review the action of the probate court in assuming without first appointing a general administrator to order the hearing of claims before himself, it being doubtful whether How. St. § 5853 is broad enough to permit it to be done under pendency of special administration.—Jenks v. St. Clair Probate Judge, 96 Mich. 122.

¶ 468. Mandamus will not lie to compel a judge of probate to extend the time for proving claims.—People ex rel. United States Attorney v. Monroe County Probate Judge, 16 Mich. 204.

¶ 469. Mandamus lies to enforce a creditor's right to a hearing of his claim against an intestate's estate where the estate is not closed.—Hart v. Shiawassee Circuit Judge, 56 Mich. 592.

¶ 470. Mandamus lies to compel the commissioners on an estate to return evidence into the probate court where the law requires it.—Buchoz v. Pray, 37 Mich. 512.

¶ 471. Mandamus will not lie to compel a probate judge to allow a claim against a decedent's estate, the proper remedy being by appeal from the order of disallowance.—John Hancock Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Wayne Probate Judge, 97 Mich. 618.

Appeals in incompetency proceedings, see ante § 63.

Laches and delay as bar to relief, see ante § 23.

¶ 472. Proceedings in the circuit court to test the validity of orders of the probate court appointing guardians for incompetent persons are to be reviewed on certiorari or error and not by mandamus to compel judicial action by vacating an order of appointment.—Coot v. Willett, 93 Mich. 304.

¶ 473. Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel the probate court to proceed, upon a proper petition, to a hearing and determination of the present competency of one who has been adjudged an incompetent person.—Coot v. Willett, 93 Mich. 304.

¶ 474. One who has been adjudged an incompetent person cannot, after waiting nearly six years, have a mandamus to compel the setting aside on jurisdictional grounds of such adjudication, as those who have acted in good faith in reliance upon the jurisdiction might be seriously affected; but he is entitled to a hearing as to his present competency.—Coot v. Willett, 93 Mich. 304.

¶ 475. Mandamus will not be granted to compel a probate judge to vacate an order denying a petition for an accounting by a guardian, since such order is appealable.—Hopper v. Livingston Probate Judge, 137 Mich. 124.

Compelling settlement of pleadings, see also ante ¶ 221.

Propriety of mandamus to review highway proceeding, see also Highways ¶ 191.

¶ 476. The circuit court cannot be required by mandamus to appoint commissioners to condemn, in favor of a street railway company, the franchises of a plank-road company, until the proceedings had, under the petition, shown that the land asked for is subject to condemnation.—Detroit, S. & D. R. Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 95 Mich. 318.

¶ 477. Where condemnation proceedings had been commenced in the circuit court by a railroad and objections filed by the property owners, and after a hearing the court had dismissed the proceedings, review thereof cannot be had by mandamus inasmuch as the dismissal was a final order disposing of the entire proceeding, such being reviewable by error.—Detroit United Ry. v. Oakland Circuit Judge, 146 Mich. 540.

¶ 478. An order to show cause against mandamus was allowed to test condemnation proceedings by a railroad, where an order of the probate court dismissing the proceedings on the ground that the taking proposed was not for public use was appealed to the circuit under the general statute (Comp. L. 1897, § 669) for appeals from orders of the probate court and not under the statute for appeals in condemnation cases, and where the circuit court instead of reversing the probate court and remanding the case reversed the order of dismissal and set the case down for hearing on the merits in the circuit court. The ordinary remedy by appeal or certiorari was deemed inadequate in such circumstances because the jurisdiction of the merits erroneously assumed by the circuit court might result in a judgment of condemnation under which the railroad company might take possession before review of such judgment could be had, and thereby might use the land before it could be decided whether the use was a public or a private one.—Pere Marquette R. Co. v. United States Gypsum Co., 148 Mich. 308. [Mandamus was held to be the proper writ on hearing because the appeal was a nullity and should have been vacated and the case remanded.—United States Gypsum Co. v. Kent Circuit Judge, 150 Mich. 668.]

¶ 479. Mandamus to compel the probate court to set aside an award of damages in a railroad condemnation proceeding which had been paid under protest was denied where the land had been actually appropriated.—Marquette, H. & O. R. Co. v. Houghton Probate Judge, 53 Mich. 217.

¶ 480. On granting mandamus to compel the vacation by a circuit judge of an order made in an appeal from the probate court in an eminent domain proceeding, such being beyond any appellate jurisdiction, and on remanding the proceeding to the probate court, leave was reserved to petitioner, the condemning corporation, to apply for a certiorari to review the condemnation proceedings in view of the expiration meantime of the time within which common law certiorari might be applied for.—United States Gypsum Co. v. Kent Circuit Judge, 150 Mich. 668.

¶ 481. Mandamus will be denied to quash a certiorari issued to review a highway commissioner's proceedings in laying out a private road; there being an adequate remedy by appeal after rendition of judgment in the circuit court.—Gibson v. Lenawee Circuit Judge, 97 Mich. 620.

¶ 482. The relator railroad crossed a public street, and was ordered by the circuit court, under section 6234, Comp. L. 1897, to build a bridge for the street. Another railroad was under contract with the relator using the same crossing. Held, mandamus would not on this account lie to vacate the circuit court's order, but relator should take steps to adjust the equities with the other road.—Chicago, D. & C. G. T. Junct. R. Co. v. St. Clair Circuit Judge, 156 Mich. 567.

Mandamus to compel justice to make or amend return to certiorari, see Jud. Act, chap. LXXVIII, § 32; Comp. L. 1915, § 14432.

¶ 483. Under Comp. L. 1897, § 997, providing that, in garnishment proceedings, within 30 days after the examination therein, at the request of the plaintiff, the justice shall issue a summons commanding the garnishee to appear and show cause, mandamus will lie to compel the justice to issue such summons if applied for within the 30 days, though the plaintiff did not appear at the time of disclosure and judgment was entered against him.—Hyde v. Chadwick, 132 Mich. 270.

¶ 484. Mandamus lies to compel a justice of the peace to enter in proper form a verdict in replevin and judgment on it, which though informal plainly indicated for which party the jury found the issues.—People v. Foote, 1 D. 102.

¶ 485. When judgment of discontinuance is rendered by the justice in a replevin suit, the defendant, if he waives a return of the property, is entitled of right to have his damages assessed, and if the justice refuses to assess them he may be compelled to do so by mandamus.—People ex rel. Taylor v. Tripp, 15 Mich. 518; People ex rel. Forbes v. Washtenaw Circuit Judge, 23 Mich. 497; People ex rel. La Barr v. Osborn, 38 Mich. 313; Humphrey v. Bayn, 45 Mich. 565; Johnson v. Dick, 69 Mich. 108.

¶ 486. The writ will issue to compel a justice who has dismissed a writ of replevin to receive evidence of the value of the property if return is waived.—People ex rel. La Barr v. Osborn, 38 Mich. 313.

¶ 487. While mandamus may issue to compel a justice, if he refuses, to proceed and enter up a judgment in a case proper for a judgment, it will not lie to compel him to vacate or change a judgment he has already rendered, and which is subject to be reviewed by certiorari or on appeal.—O'Brien v. Tallman, 36 Mich. 13.

¶ 488. Where a case in the justice court is adjourned until a specified day a clear legal duty rests upon the justice to take some action or render some judgment on the adjourned day, and if the justice, on request, refuses to perform this duty, he may be compelled by mandamus to perform it.—People ex rel. Dota v. McKay, How. N. P. 103.

¶ 489. Mandamus lies to compel a circuit court commissioner to proceed on an order of reference tendered to him for execution in a foreclosure case.—Warner v. Randall, 37 Mich. 473.

¶ 490. Mandamus will issue to compel a circuit court commissioner to tax costs in proceedings under the fraudulent debtor act, and to issue execution for collection thereof.—Watson v. Randall, 44 Mich. 514.

¶ 491. No appeal lies from a decision of the State Court of Mediation and Arbitration created by Comp. L. 1897, §§ 559-568, and therefore where such a court exceeds its powers by granting a rehearing after the rendition of a decision, the writ of mandamus will be granted to vacate the order granting a rehearing.—Renaud v. State Court of Mediation, 124 Mich. 648.

Statutory denial of power to issue writ to state officers, see Jud. Act, chap. XXXVI, § 3; Comp. L. 1915, § 13439.

¶ 493. Mandamus cannot issue to the governor; and his voluntary appearance and professed willingness to abide by the decision of the court, though questioning its jurisdiction, will not give jurisdiction to issue a mandamus to him.—People ex rel. Sutherland v. Governor, 29 Mich. 320.

¶ 494. The performance of the duty imposed upon the governor by the acts of congress making a land grant for the construction of the Portage Lake & Lake Superior Ship Canal, and by the state legislation on the subject, to issue, when satisfied that the work has been done according to law, his certificate of the fact, cannot be enforced by mandamus.—People ex rel. Sutherland v. Governor, 29 Mich. 320.

¶ 495. Mandamus will not lie to compel the governor to perform duties of a purely executive or political character.—Germaine v. Ferris, 176 Mich. 585.

Compellable duties of public official bodies, see also post § 74.

¶ 496. The performance of a ministerial duty may as well be enforced when it rests upon an aggregate body like the common council as when incumbent upon a single officer.—People ex rel. Detroit Park Com'rs v. Detroit Common Council, 28 Mich. 228.

Ministerial and discretionary duties, see post § 81.
Duties relating to sales for taxes, see post § 87.
Mandamus to compel audit, see post § 91.
Compelling issuance of warrants for payment, see post § 98.
Making contracts for state printing, see post ¶ 664.

¶ 497. The board of state auditors is made by the constitution an independent tribunal over which the courts have no supervisory control, and the supreme court has no jurisdiction by mandamus to coerce or direct its action.—People ex rel. Dewey v. Board of State Auditors, 32 Mich. 191.

¶ 498. The supreme court exercises no control over the board of state auditors in its disposition of claims against the state, not provided for by general law.—People ex rel. Ambler v. Auditor General, 38 Mich. 746.

¶ 499. Mandamus lies to compel the board of state auditors to perform mandatory duties imposed on it by the legislature outside of the exclusive powers vested in it by Const. art. VIII, §§ 4, 5.—People ex rel. Ayres v. State Board of Auditors, 42 Mich. 422.

¶ 500. The writ of mandamus has been granted for the purpose, among others, of compelling the board of state auditors to take action to carry out the provisions of Laws 1879, Act No. 168, in regard to the publication of the state reports.—People ex rel. Ayres v. State Board of Auditors, 42 Mich. 422.

¶ 501. Mandamus will not lie to compel the president and secretary of the senate, or the speaker and clerk of the house, to insert in the journals matter by way of protest which the senate and house have refused to consider or receive; although the constitution requires the keeping of a journal and authorizes protests to be made and entered in the journal.—Turnbull v. Giddings, 95 Mich. 314.

B. COMPELLABLE ACTS AND DUTIES.

Necessity of duty and clear legal right to performance and of exigency and beneficial occasion for writ, see ante §§ 4-7.
Futility of writ as bar to issuance, see ante §§ 8, 9.
Impolicy, injustice, misconduct, unfairness, and delay as reasons against writ, see ante §§ 10-12.
Denial of writ to compel useless annulment of act void on the record, see ante ¶ 49.
Necessity that official duty exist and be certain and clear, see post § 75.
Necessity of demand for performance and refusal by respondent, see post § 76.
Nondelegability or abdication of duty to avoid mandamus, see post § 77.
Duty pertaining to other than respondent, see post § 78.
Duty pertaining to respondent in unofficial capacity, see post § 79.
Particular duties, see post §§ 80-109.
Keeping of legislative journals, see ante ¶ 501.
Compulsion of part of demanded duty, see post § 172.
Procedure for the writ and upon the writ when issued, see post V.

Original or appellate nature of mandamus, see ante § 2.
Impropriety in mandamus to compel performance of duty of inquiring into collateral or antecedent issues and questions, see post § 158.

¶ 502. It is within the province of courts to restrain public bodies and officers of counties and other municipal divisions from exceeding their jurisdiction, and to require them to perform such specific duties as the law imposes on them.—Attorney General v. Iron County Board of Canvassers, 64 Mich. 607; Tennant v. Crocker, 85 Mich. 328.

¶ 503. Where a subordinate body has been vested by the legislature with the right to exercise its judgment, and with the power to determine questions of fact, mandamus may lie to compel the body to act, but will not lie to compel it to act in a particular way.—Shipman v. State Live-Stock Sanitary Commission, 115 Mich. 488.

¶ 504. The use of the writ of mandamus directed to a board of supervisors to compel the performance of an act enjoined by law, and to compel the performance of such official acts as clearly pertain to their duty and are an absolute obligation, is well recognized.—Attorney General ex rel. Greenfield v. Board Sup'rs Alcona Co., 167 Mich. 666.

¶ 505. Mandamus lies to compel the state treasurer to deliver up to the makers for cancellation municipal aid bonds deposited with him under an unconstitutional statute.—People ex rel. Bay City v. State Treasurer, 23 Mich. 499; People ex rel. Township of La Grange v. State Treasurer, 24 Mich. 468.

¶ 505a. Legislation authorizing municipal corporation to vote taxes and pledge their credit in aid of the construction of railroads by private companies is unconstitutional; and, therefore, a township will not be compelled to execute and issue bonds in accordance with a resolution adopted by it in favor of a company which subsequently constructed its road in reliance thereupon.—People ex rel. Detroit & H. R. Co. v. Salem Township Board, 20 Mich. 452.

General necessity of clear legal duty, see ante §§ 3, 4.
Necessity of existence and sufficiency of fund for payment in order to have mandamus to pay claim on it, see post § 96.
Duty to certify result of election and admit to office, see post ¶ 561.
Sufficiency of relator's interest to sustain the action, see post §§ 126-128.
Necessity and sufficiency of allegations of duty in petition, see post § 135.
Sufficiency of record showing to rebut duty or delinquency, see post § 162.

¶ 506. It would require a very clear case of practical acquiescence to authorize the court to compel the head of a bureau of the government to follow precedents which he does not himself regard as binding, unless they are at least so harmonious with the language of the law as to create no repugnance to it.—Employers' Liability Assur. Co., Ltd. v. Insurance Com'r, 64 Mich. 614.

¶ 507. No mandamus can issue to a state officer to compel him to perform any but some unquestionable and legally defined duty. Thus, the writ will not be granted to compel the state treasurer to pay a balance claimed to be due on bills of the Government Stock Bank, there being no adjudication that the amount claimed is due from the state.—Bresler v. Butler, 60 Mich. 40.

¶ 508. Mandamus does not lie to compel a township to raise money to pay bonds so long as it is an open question whether the bonds are a legal obligation on the township and whether the relator is a bona fide holder of them.—Loomis v. Rogers Township Board, 53 Mich. 135.

¶ 509. Where city orders for work done in paving contain no promise to pay interest and are payable out of a particular fund the principal of which has been paid and accepted, mandamus to compel the payment of interest must be denied; there being no authority for such payment.—Talbot v. Mayor, etc., Bay City, 71 Mich. 118.

Necessity and sufficiency of allegations in petition, see post § 136.

¶ 510. Mandamus will not lie to compel a board of supervisors to audit a claim until the claimant has requested its allowance and has either appeared or produced proofs in support thereof, or has offered to do so; the board has the right to fix the time and place for hearing proofs, and such notice thereof is enough if it occurs in the course of the proceedings.—Hickey v. Oakland County Sup'rs, 62 Mich. 94.

¶ 511. Mandamus to compel board of supervisors to reconvene and canvass vote for removal of county seat will be denied where board has not refused to canvass but proposes to do so on adjourned day.—Double v. McQueen, 96 Mich. 39.

¶ 512. The circuit court may, in its discretion, entertain an application for mandamus requiring the common council, as a board of canvassers, to canvass the returns of votes for alderman, and issue a certificate to the relator, without a previous application by the relator to the board for such certificate, where it is convinced that such request would not have availed.—Hilton v. Common Council of Grand Rapids, 112 Mich. 500.

¶ 513. A city collector, as the proper custodian of a fund mistakenly paid by him to the county treasurer, was not required to present a claim therefor to the county supervisors, as the claim was not one against the county nor against money belonging to the county; and mandamus against the treasurer individually was a proper remedy to compel its restitution.—Webster v. Wheeler, 119 Mich. 601.

¶ 514. A motion to adjourn the meeting of a village council was made, and before it was voted on relator appeared and filed an application for a saloon license. Held, that mandamus would not lie to force the council to issue the license, where it appeared that since its adjournment the council had not had time to consider the application.—Boos v. Scudder, 163 Mich. 678.

¶ 515. Mandamus will be granted to compel a ward board of registration to meet and hear the claim of a party to be registered as a voter; and it will be no answer to the application therefor that the case has been reserved for the consideration of the city board when it was the duty of the ward board to pass upon it.—People ex rel. Wood v. Detroit Board of Registration, 17 Mich. 427.

Proper party respondent, see post §§ 130, 131.

¶ 516. Mandamus to the secretary of state will not lie to compel him to issue patents to state lands; that is the duty of the governor. Crane v. Secretary of State, 51 Mich. 195.

¶ 517. A city police commissioner will not be compelled by mandamus to enforce section 11334, Comp. L. 1897, providing that it shall be the duty of designated officers to disperse persons assembling unlawfully, riotously, or tumultuously, by himself dispersing an assemblage witnessing and playing a game of Sunday baseball, since he is not one of the designated officers.—Yerkes v. Smith, 157 Mich. 557. (Per Hooker, J.; Montgomery and Ostrander, JJ., concurring.)

Duty of treasurer improperly holding public money to repay it as individual to proper custodian, see ante ¶ 513.

¶ 518. Where a register of deeds who has received a conveyance not officially, but as a private person to hold it in escrow, is forbidden by the grantor to record it, the grantee cannot have a mandamus to compel him to do so.—People ex rel. Austin v. Curtis, 41 Mich. 723.

Existence and certainty of duty, see ante § 75.

Nature of compellable duties and obligation of respondent to perform, see ante §§ 74, 77-79.

Necessity of demand and refusal to perform, see ante § 76.

Particular duties and functions, see post §§ 82-109.

Duties of arresting and prosecuting for crime, see ante § 57.

To compel meeting of county board, see also Counties ¶ 23.

To compel service of criminal warrant, see ante § 57; and also Arrest ¶ 115.

Right of person entitled to sheriff's deed to compel it, see also Executions ¶ 253.

To compel release of person arrested in violation of privilege under Federal process, see also Courts ¶ 350.

¶ 519. Mandamus will not lie, at suit of a judgment debtor, to have the court order that an execution issued, as of a premature date, be returned and set aside or amended; since the plaintiff has another remedy.—Jennings v. Kalamazoo Circuit Judge, 44 Mich. 99.

¶ 520. Mandamus lies to compel the sheriff to imprison a person convicted under the bastardy act when necessary to compel him to contribute to the child's support.—Waite v. Washington, 44 Mich. 388.

¶ 521. Mandamus lies to compel the county treasurer to keep his office at the county seat.—Rice v. Shay, 43 Mich. 380.

¶ 522. Mandamus does not lie to compel aldermen to attend meetings of the common council, and to perform their general official duties regularly.—People ex rel. Fitzgerald v. Whipple, 41 Mich. 548.

¶ 523. Where certain members of a village council combined to prevent a quorum of the council from meeting, their attendance could not be compelled by mandamus.—Wilson v. Cleveland, 157 Mich. 510.

¶ 524. It is beyond the authority of a circuit judge to direct by mandamus that a village clerk shall attend the next meeting of the council.—People ex rel. Cady v. Ihnken, 129 Mich. 466.

¶ 525. Where a drain commissioner enlarging a drain fails to comply with the statute as to the filing of papers, mandamus will lie to compel compliance with the statute, to lay a foundation for the statutory writ of certiorari.—Auditor General v. Crane, 152 Mich. 94.

¶ 525a. Where a city, under Laws, 1869, Act No. 45, which was invalid, had issued bonds in aid of a railroad and deposited them with the state treasurer, who, on demand therefor, declined to deliver them back to the proper authorities of the city, such delivery was compelled by mandamus.—People ex rel. Bay City v. State Treasurer, 23 Mich. 499.

¶ 525b. Municipal aid bonds deposited with the state treasurer under a law held unconstitutional are in his official custody until delivered up, and he is responsible for their safe-keeping and return to the makers when demanded, and a mandamus lies to compel such return when refused upon a reasonable demand.—People ex rel. La Grange Township v. State Treasurer, 24 Mich. 468.

Duty depending on fact, see also post ¶ 595.
Ministerial or discretionary nature of particular duties, see post §§ 82-109.
Discretionary duties respecting public lands, see post § 100.
Construction of return as showing nature of power exercised, see post § 161.

¶ 526. The duty imposed upon the governor of this state by the act of congress making a land grant for the construction of the Portage Lake & Lake Superior ship canal and harbor, and by the state legislation on the subject, to issue his certificate of the fact when he shall be satisfied that the work has been done in conformity with the law, is not one of a purely ministerial character, leaving him no discretion; and mandamus will not lie to compel such issue.—People ex rel. Sutherland v. Governor, 29 Mich. 320.

¶ 527. The action of the head of an executive department of the state is not judicial and therefore not subject to direct proceedings for review.—People ex rel. Ambler v. Auditor General, 38 Mich. 746.

¶ 528. Executive discretion cannot be judicially reviewed; and where the action of any officer to whom the state confides the auditing of claims against it is anything but ministerial, it cannot be reviewed.—People ex rel. Ambler v. Auditor General, 38 Mich. 746.

¶ 529. Whether mandamus lies to interfere with the action of the auditor general on matters of a purely public and executive nature, where it is not purely mechanical, but involves the exercise of mixed functions, quære.—People ex rel. Ambler v. Auditor General, 38 Mich. 746.

¶ 530. When a mayor and council have in good faith exercised the discretion conferred upon them by the statute in regard to licensing saloons, such discretion cannot be reviewed by mandamus.—Sherlock v. Stuart, 96 Mich. 193, citing Van Dann v. Uhl, October 29, 1891, unreported.

¶ 531. The discretion of the prosecuting attorney in refusing to attach to a petition for the removal of a public officer a statement that in his opinion the case demands investigation (How. St. § 653) is not reviewable on mandamus.—McLaughlin v. Burroughs, 90 Mich. 311.

¶ 532. The decision of the presiding officer of a city common council in declaring a resolution carried or lost does not involve the exercise of discretion but is ministerial, and mandamus lies to compel him to do his duty.—Tennant v. Crocker, 85 Mich. 328.

¶ 533. A city police commissioner is intrusted with discretion in determining how to distribute his police force, and cannot be coerced by mandamus to detail a portion of his force to watch certain saloons kept open in violation of law, and to arrest and prosecute the offenders. (Per Brooke, J., Montgomery, Hooker and McAlvay, JJ., concurring; Blair, C. J., Ostrander and Montgomery, JJ., concurring in the result; Grant, J., dissenting.)—Gowan v. Smith, 157 Mich. 443.

Quo warranto and not mandamus as remedy to try title to office, see ante § 20.
Referendum elections on questions to voters, see post § 83.
Compelling certification of result and admission of person chosen to office, see post § 84.
Necessity of clear legal right in relator to name on ballot, see ante ¶ 29.
Necessity of refusal to perform duty, see also ante § 76.
Futility of writ as reason against issuance, see ante § 8.
Proper persons to be relators, see post § 127.
Allegations in petition for writ, see post ¶ 825.
Allegations in return as to improper condition of ballot boxes for recount, see post ¶ 852.
Ordinary and regular methods of regulating elections and count of votes, see Elections.
Judicial power in election matters, see also Elections § 93.
Ministerial nature of duty of canvassers of elections, see Elections § 53.
Mandamus to compel certification of proper nominee of party convention, see also Elections § 25.

¶ 534. The supreme court has jurisdiction of an application for a mandamus restraining the secretary of state from giving notices of election of state senators and directing him to issue them under a former act, on the ground that the later act is in violation of Const. art. IV, §§ 2, 4; the legislative discretion not being absolute.—Giddings v. Secretary of State, 93 Mich. 1.

¶ 536. Mandamus was issued compelling the controller of Detroit to take the necessary action to carry into effect the election law of 1889 (Laws 1889, Act No. 263).—Common Council of Detroit v. Rush, 82 Mich. 532.

¶ 537. Mandamus lies to compel a common council to designate at a lawful meeting chairmen of boards of inspectors of election and registration to take the place of those illegally appointed.—Dingwall v. Common Council of Detroit, 82 Mich. 568.

¶ 538. Mandamus will lie to compel a board of election commissioners, in making up the ballot for use at an election, to comply with Pub. Acts 1895, No. 271, § 14, by assigning to the ticket of the party having the greatest number of votes within the county at the last preceding general election the first place upon the ballot, and to the tickets of all other parties positions governed relatively by the same rule.—Baker v. Board of Election Com'rs of Wayne County, 110 Mich. 685.

¶ 539. Mandamus may be granted on petition of candidates for office duly nominated at a primary to prohibit the board of election commissioners from unlawfully placing the names of candidates of other political parties on the official ballot which parties did not cast at such primary 15 per cent of the vote cast by them in the last November election for secretary of state as required by Act 281, P. A. 1909, § 37.—Brown v. Board Election Com'rs Kent Co., 174 Mich. 477.

¶ 540. On petition for mandamus to compel the board of election commissioners to place relator's name on a ballot an order to show cause may be granted.—DeFoe v. Board Election Com'rs Bay City, 174 Mich. 472.

¶ 541. The common council of a village, when convened to determine the result of an election, as required by law, can act only upon the returns received from the board of inspectors, and the only remedy of a candidate, who is defeated by the improper rejection of ballots not stamped with crosses in the circles at their heads, is by quo warranto.—Johnson v. Board of Canvassers of Village of Casnovia, 101 Mich. 187.

¶ 542. Where a board of canvassers canvassed the votes cast for a certain office as reported by the inspectors of election in a second or substituted return, made after the filing of the original return, mandamus will lie to compel a recanvass from the original return.—Roemer v. Board of Canvassers of Detroit, 90 Mich. 27.

¶ 543. Where after making a recount under How. St. § 234a, the board of canvassers has declared the result and has adjourned, it becomes functus officio, and the remedy of an aggrieved party is by quo warranto, not by mandamus to compel the board to reassemble and to make a full and detailed report of all ballots, etc.—Packard v. Board of Canvassers of Menominee County, 94 Mich. 450.

¶ 544. Mandamus was granted to compel second recount where canvassers had recanvassed votes of a precinct not included in petition for recount.—May v. Board of Canvassers of Wayne County, 94 Mich. 505.

¶ 545. Mandamus was granted, after unauthorized recount of votes, to compel board to reconvene and recanvass votes according to original returns, and to report same to secretary of state.—Belknap v. Board of Canvassers of Ionia County, 94 Mich. 516; Vance v. Board of Canvassers of St. Clair County, 95 Mich. 462.

¶ 546. Where a board of election canvassers refuses to make a recount it may be compelled to proceed and make such recount, but when the board has acted, declared the result and adjourned mandamus will not lie to compel the board to reconvene and declare some other result which a court of justice may determine to be a more just one.—Dickinson v. Board of Canvassers of Cheboygan County, 148 Mich. 513.

¶ 547. Where a body is the judge of the election and qualifications of its own members, as in the case of legislators or aldermen, mandamus will be denied to compel a recount.—Naumann v. Board of City Canvassers of Detroit, 73 Mich. 252; Wheeler v. Board of Canvassers of Manistee County, 94 Mich. 448.

Proper persons to be relators, see post § 127. Allegations of petition, see post ¶ 821.

¶ 548. The duties charged upon the secretary of state relative to a petition for a referendum under the Constitution, art. V, § 1, as amended in 1913, being ministerial and not discretionary, he may be required to perform such duties by mandamus.—Thompson v. Secretary of State, 192 Mich. 512.

¶ 549. The decision of the board of supervisors in passing on a petition to submit to vote the question of prohibition, under the local option statute, may be reviewed on mandamus by the courts.—Crawford v. Board Sup'rs Gratiot Co., 160 Mich. 31.

¶ 550. A board of supervisors, after refusing to inquire into the genuineness of signatures on a local option petition, adjourned sine die without taking the necessary steps for the submission of the proposition to the voters. Mandamus was denied by the lower court to compel the board to reconvene and complete the work. Held, on certiorari, that mandamus should issue from the supreme court ordering the board to reconvene and determine the sufficiency of the petition by limiting their inquiry to its validity on its face.—Kern v. Board Sup'rs St. Clair Co., 160 Mich. 11. (Ostrander, McAlvay and Brooke, JJ., concurring, in separate opinions.)

¶ 551. Mandamus will issue to compel a city council to do such acts as may be necessary to hold a special election to submit a proposed charter, though because of lapse of time certain statutory or charter provisions cannot be complied with, if no disfranchisement of electors will result, as in view of Pub. Acts, 1909, Act 279, sec. 26, How. 2nd Ed., § 5467, the provisions are not mandatory.—Attorney General ex rel. Baum v. City of Saginaw, 177 Mich. 432.

¶ 552. Mandamus lies to compel the state board of canvassers to convene and recanvass the votes cast for or against a proposed amendment to the constitution, where a palpable mistake has been committed by the previous board.—Rich v. Board of State Canvassers, 100 Mich. 453.

¶ 553. Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel a board of supervisors to reconvene and recanvass votes cast at a local option election.—Baldwin v. Board Sup'rs of Alger County, 189 Mich. 372.

¶ 554. Mandamus will lie to compel a board of supervisors to pass a resolution declaring for local option in a county after the electors have duly voted for prohibition.—Paul v. Benzie Circuit Judge, 169 Mich. 452.

¶ 555. The relator filed with the respondent board of supervisors a petition demanding a recanvass of the votes cast at a local option election held under Act No. 207, Pub. Acts 1889, as amended by Act No. 183, Pub. Acts 1899, on the grounds that certain ballots were improperly allowed by the inspectors and others improperly rejected, and for various irregularities at the polling places. The respondent declined to consider the petition, having made a regular canvass and entered the order making prohibition effective in the county. In mandamus to compel the board to make a recanvass, held, that its functions in making the canvass and tabulating the returns were purely administrative, and not subject to judicial review, and the writ was denied.—Haehnle Brewing Co. v. Board Sup'rs Jackson Co., 156 Mich. 498.

¶ 556. Where a board of supervisors, in canvassing the returns of an election on the question of prohibition, refuses to pass any resolution on the ground that it is not able to determine from the return whether it should declare for or against prohibition, and adjourns without taking any action, mandamus will lie to compel the board to reconvene and pass a resolution in accordance with the decree of the court.—Attorney General v. Board Sup'rs Genesee Co., 166 Mich. 61.

Impropriety of mandamus to try title to office, see ante § 20.

Necessity of right in relator to office demanded, see ante § 6, ¶ 30.

Allegations of petition for writ, see post ¶ 824.

¶ 557. Mandamus lies to compel the board of supervisors to admit a member duly certified as elected.—Robinson v. Cheboygan Board Sup'rs, 49 Mich. 321.

¶ 558. Where the charter of Eaton Rapids provided that the mayor should represent that city in the county board of supervisors, mandamus was granted to compel the board to recognize him.—Smith v. Eaton Springs Sup'rs, 56 Mich. 217.

¶ 559. The charter of Port Huron makes the common council the final judges of the election of aldermen. Held, that mandamus would not lie to compel them to reinstate one whom they had excluded without a proper hearing on the merits.—People ex rel. Cooley v. Fitz Gerald, 41 Mich. 2.

¶ 560. Where the city board of canvassers of election in Detroit had refused to declare the result of the election of one candidate for alderman, and had declared elected others who had not received a majority of the votes cast, mandamus was granted to compel the respondents to meet and canvass the returns, declare the result, and issue certificates of election to the relators.—Coll v. City Board of Canvassers, 83 Mich. 367.

¶ 561. After a recount of ballots cast at a primary election by the county board of canvassers resulting in relator's favor, his opponents filed mandamus against the county board to compel it to reconvene and recount on account of the alleged illegal ballots. In that action the court found the existence of such illegalities but also that the net result was many more votes in relator's favor than he had theretofore. A copy of the record of that case was included in the return. Held, a writ of mandamus against the state board of canvassers to compel them to issue a certificate to relator could not be denied on the ground that the correctness of the recount was being questioned in the courts and was undetermined since the record showed a result in relator's favor.—Beakes v. Board State Canvassers, 172 Mich. 408.

¶ 562. Mandamus was granted to compel the common council of Detroit to consider and act upon the mayor's nominations made under the act establishing a board of public works.—People ex rel. Attorney General v. Detroit Common Council, 29 Mich. 108.

¶ 563. Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel a common council to approve an off-cial bond offered by a duly appointed person whom the council cannot remove without charges and trial; and this, though the mayor who made the appointment seeks to recall it, and though quo warranto proceedings by the relator against a second appointee are pending.—Speed v. Common Council of Detroit, 97 Mich. 198.

¶ 564. Mandamus will not be granted upon the application of the moderator and a director of a graded school district to compel the assessor to meet with them and fill the vacancies caused by the resignation of the other two trustees, there being other methods of filling the vacancies also provided by statute and no reason shown why such other methods could not be followed.—Johnston v. Mitchell, 120 Mich. 589.

Impropriety of trying legality of removal by mandamus to pay salary, see post ¶¶ 904, 905.

¶ 565. Mandamus lies to a police board to compel the reinstatement of a policeman whom, upon acquitting of specific charges preferred against him, it has adjudged guilty of another offense not specified and has dismissed; and this, though the board has summary power of removal.—Wilkinson v. Board of Police Com'rs of Saginaw, 107 Mich. 394.

Duties pertaining to public funds after collection, see post § 88 et seq.

Mandamus or action on contract as proper remedy on claim, see also ante ¶ 108.

Doubtful legality of bonds to be paid as bar to writ, see ante ¶ 508.

Other remedy as bar, see also ante § 5.

Propriety of trial of title to the land, see also ante ¶ 19.

Laches and delay as reason against issuance of writ, see ante § 12.

Denial of writ because too late to be effectual, see also ante ¶ 55.

Allegations in petition for writ, see post ¶ 820.

¶ 566. Mandamus lies to compel the board of supervisors to apportion upon the taxable property of the county the sum properly certified to be due from the county to the state on account of taxes.—People ex rel. Auditor General v. Jackson County Sup'rs, 24 Mich. 237.

¶ 567. Mandamus is granted to compel the supervisors to spread upon the tax-rolls of their county a sum lost by the state in consequence of the failure of the county treasurer to account for moneys received at a tax sale conducted by him.—People ex rel. Attorney General v. St. Clair County Sup'rs, 30 Mich. 388.

¶ 568. Mandamus lies to compel a town clerk to issue the proper certificate for the levy of a tax to satisfy a judgment against the township, even though the cause of action arose in territory that was set off as a new township after it arose and before judgment.—Courtright v. Brooks Township Clerk, 54 Mich. 182.

¶ 569. Under Comp. L. 1871, § 477, How. St. § 483, it requires a popular vote to authorize a county to borrow or raise by tax for building purposes more than $1,000 in any one year; and mandamus is refused to compel provision to be made by taxation to pay warrants amounting to $2,640, purporting to have been issued by a board of supervisors for county building purposes between June, 1874, and January, 1875, where the question of raising or borrowing this money has never been submitted to a vote of the people and where the relator had notice of the invalidity of the warrants.—People ex rel. Pack v. Presque Isle Sup'rs, 36 Mich. 377.

¶ 570. Mandamus will not lie to compel a township to assess a tax to pay the uncollected part of a former assessment ordered to pay the amount then due on its bonds, until after the sale for delinquent taxes of the lands whereupon the former assessment was made.—Wayne County Sav. Bank v. Roscommon County Sup'rs, 97 Mich. 630.

¶ 571. Mandamus will lie to compel ministerial officers to discharge a duty imposed upon them by statute with reference to the assessment and collection of taxes, e. g., to lay a drain assessment before the board of supervisors, unless the circumstances are clearly such that justice requires that the writ should not issue.—Laubach v. O'Meara, 107 Mich. 29.

¶ 572. It being the duty of the board of supervisors to determine that drain taxes are authorized by law, a person injured by their error in such determination has a remedy by mandamus.—Zink v. Monroe County Sup'rs, 68 Mich. 283.

¶ 573. Township officials who refuse to reassess as required by §§ 4366 and 4369 Comp. L. 1897, §§ 3423 and 3426, How. St., 2nd Ed., a drain tax which had been set aside for other than jurisdictional reasons, may be compelled by mandamus to do so.—McDermott v. Alger, 186 Mich. 278.

¶ 574. Mandamus will not be granted to compel the assessors to deduct the amount of United States bonds included in the taxable assets of an insurance company where a larger amount of "reserve fund" had erroneously been deducted as liability.—Detroit Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Hartz, 132 Mich. 518.

¶ 575. Where a plaintiff is assessed for property owned by another, mandamus will not lie against the taxing officers to strike the levy from the rolls, since the plaintiff has a complete remedy at law.—W. A. Sturgeon & Co. v. Board Assessors City of Detroit, 159 Mich. 199.

¶ 576. The court would not, on motion for mandamus, inquire into the exercise of the power—judicial in its nature—conferred upon the auditor general by the Act of 1843 (Sess. L., p. 81), authorizing him in certain cases to forbear to sell or to withhold a conveyance of lands sold for taxes.—People ex rel. Sweet v. Adam, 3 Mich. 427.

¶ 577. Mandamus will lie to compel the auditor general to issue a certificate of error where the original owner of lands sold at a tax sale tenders the full amount of taxes due and demands a certificate of error, though a void deed has been issued covering the lands.—Hubbard v. Auditor General, 120 Mich. 505.

¶ 578. The supreme court will not issue a writ of mandamus to compel the auditor general to issue a certificate of error canceling certain tax deeds conveying lands belonging to an estate of which relator is trustee, where the relator has filed a bill of complaint in the circuit court, involving substantially the same questions, making all the parties in interest defendants.—Lillie v. Auditor General, 173 Mich. 538.

¶ 579. The acts of the auditor general in issuing a certificate of error canceling a tax deed under Comp. L. 1897, § 3921, as amended by Pub. Acts 1903, No. 80, How. 2nd Ed. § 1868, on his own motion are ministerial and not judicial so that a writ of mandamus will lie to compel him to vacate and set aside a certificate of error wrongfully issued.—Plank v. Auditor General, 192 Mich. 313.

¶ 580. Mandamus will not issue at the instance of a railroad company to compel the auditor general to cancel the sale of land for delinquent taxes on the ground that the land was not locally taxable where it appeared that part of the land sold for taxes was taxable and the taxes had not been paid on that portion.—Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Auditor General, 144 Mich. 77.

¶ 581. Mandamus will lie to compel the auditor general to refund the money paid by a purchaser at a void tax sale.—Gurd v. Auditor General, 122 Mich. 151.

¶ 582. Mandamus will not lie to compel the auditor general to refund taxes paid as a condition of purchase at a state bid at the tax sale where the action of assumpsit on the claim would have been barred by the statute of limitations.—McRae v. Auditor General, 146 Mich. 594.

¶ 583. Mandamus will lie to compel the recorder of a village to fulfil the duty, imposed upon him by the charter, of advertising and selling lands returned for delinquent paving taxes; and he cannot refuse to do so on the ground that he believes the action of the council in laying the particular tax to be illegal, especially if the proceedings are sufficiently fair on their face to protect ministerial action, and the work has been done and the tax in a great measure paid in.—Hudson Common Council v. Whitney, 58 Mich. 158.

Correction of improper injunction against misapplication of funds, see ante § 45.
Illegality of proposed bonds as bar to mandamus to issue them, see also ante § 11.

¶ 584. A board of education is entitled to mandamus to compel its treasurer to pay its funds to the proper depository under the law.—Port Huron Board of Education v. Runnels, 57 Mich. 46.

¶ 585. A writ of mandamus will lie in favor of parties holding a judgment against a city, to compel the city treasurer to turn over certain moneys collected by means of a tax spread for the express purpose of paying a judgment against the city, although there was nothing in the tax roll to identify it as the judgment in question.—Montpelier Sav. Bank & Trust Co. v. Quinn, 149 Mich. 701.

¶ 586. The fact that the provisions of the statute were not strictly observed by the assessing officers will not prevent a mandamus from issuing to compel a city treasurer to turn over moneys collected and held by him, with full knowledge of the purpose for which it was collected, and to whom it belonged.—Montpelier Sav. Bank & Trust Co. v. Quinn, 149 Mich. 701.

¶ 587. Where a city has voted under Act No. 279, Pub. Acts 1909, to revise its charter, mandamus will lie to force the city council to appropriate money to meet the expenses of a charter commission, as provided for in said act.—Attorney General v. Mayor & Common Council City of Adrian, 164 Mich. 143.

¶ 588. The insurance money collected by the board of supervisors upon the burning of a county jail building was deposited pursuant to section 2544, Comp. L. 1897, with the general funds of the county, and such funds were never reduced below the amount of said insurance money. The electors of the county voted to expend said money for the building of a new jail. The site of the jail was duly established. Held, mandamus would lie to compel the board of supervisors to expend said insurance money in the erection of a jail building on said site.—Attorney General ex rel. Greenfield v. Board Sup'rs Alcona Co., 167 Mich. 666.

To compel adjustment on division of territory, see post § 90.

To compel repayment by improper to proper custodian, see also ante ¶ 513.

¶ 589. Mandamus does not lie to compel the auditor general to pay over to a county moneys which have been withheld from it in the annual settlements, under a mutual mistake of law and by authority of Comp. L. 1871, § 1090, by which the counties were charged with deficiencies on resales of state tax bids.—People ex rel. Ambler v. Auditor General, 38 Mich. 746.

¶ 590. Mandamus was not granted to compel the auditor general to accept delinquent tax-lists after July 1 (the day on which he is required by statute to list and advertise the lands for sale), and to credit the counties with the amount thereon.—People ex rel. Houghton County v. Auditor General, 36 Mich. 271.

¶ 591. Mandamus will not lie in behalf of a county to compel the auditor general to pay over to the county treasurer the taxes assessed for township, school and highway purposes in the relator's townships; such proceeding being in effect a suit against the state.—Ottawa County Sup'rs v. Auditor General, 69 Mich. 1.

¶ 592. Where money has gone into the state treasury as part of a general balance rightfully received, and not as a separate and independent item wrongfully received, mandamus will not lie to require its repayment, nor can any suit be maintained for it unless voluntarily allowed within the authority of some proper officer.—People ex rel. Ambler v. Auditor General, 38 Mich. 746.

¶ 593. Mandamus lies to compel the county treasurer to pay over to the proper local officers the amount of liquor taxes to which they are entitled by the law.—City of East Saginaw v. Saginaw County Treasurer, 44 Mich. 273.

¶ 594. A city collector who, upon settling his accounts between the city and the county, mistakenly included an item charged against the city for a soldiers' relief fund, which had not been spread on the rolls and had not been collected by the collector, was entitled by mandamus to compel the treasurer who knew of the circumstances, to repay the amount, although the latter had credited the amount to such relief fund; as he could balance the credit by a debit charge when he came to pay it.—Webster v. Wheeler, 119 Mich. 601.

¶ 595. Mandamus is not the proper remedy for compelling a township to refund the amount of a tax unlawfully levied if there is any issue involved which should go to the jury.—Byles v. Township of Golden, 52 Mich. 612.

¶ 596. Where a liquor tax belonging to a village was assessed and collected by township officers and used for township purposes, a mandamus was granted to compel its payment over to the village authorities.—People ex rel. Village of Decatur v. Decatur Township Board, 33 Mich. 385.

¶ 597. Mandamus is not the proper remedy to compel payment by a county to a township of an unliquidated demand arising from a county treasurer's default.—Township of Cumming v. County of Ogemaw, 93 Mich. 314.

¶ 598. When it appears in mandamus to compel a county treasurer to pay over to a city the amount due from a collection of delinquent taxes, that the treasurer claims a set-off for an amount alleged to be due the county for the dishonor of a check given to the county treasurer by the city treasurer for taxes due, that the dishonored check was for $4,066.70, and that the county owes the city $5,349.85, the mandamus will issue.—City of Sault Ste. Marie v. Hotten, 171 Mich. 265.

Sufficiency of record showing, see post § 161.

¶ 599. Where, after the division of a township, the town boards have met and determined the amount of the township indebtedness to be paid by the new township, such amount is a fixed and liquidated demand against the new township, which it is the duty of its town board to allow and issue orders for. If the town board refuse to perform this duty, mandamus is the proper remedy, and not an action against the township.—Township of Marathon v. Township of Oregon, 8 Mich. 372.

¶ 600. A township issued plank-road bonds which were invalid. The bonds were negotiated and the township was afterwards divided. Held, that the judgment, in a subsequent action on the bonds to which the new township was not a party, was not binding on it; and mandamus will not lie to compel the township board of the new township to meet with the township board of the old one to apportion the indebtedness arising on the bonds.—Hale v. Baldwin Tp. Board, 49 Mich. 270.

¶ 601. Mandamus lies on relation of a school-district assessor to compel the clerk of a township to which the district formerly belonged to certify to the supervisor of the township to which it now belongs the amount liquidated by the school inspectors as due to the relator's district from what remained of the old district out of which it was erected.

—Ramsey v. Everett Township Clerk, 52 Mich. 344.

¶ 602. Where after a county has been divided the whole of a state tax has, through the auditor general's error, been paid by the old county, mandamus will not lie to compel a settlement between the respective boards of supervisors; the old county's remedy is by action at law against the new county to recover back its proportionate share paid for it by plaintiff.—Ontonagon County Sup'rs v. Gogebic County Sup'rs, 74 Mich. 721.

¶ 603. Mandamus will not lie to compel a county organized from the territory of another county to refund the amount of state taxes paid by the old to the use of the new in consequence of an erroneous apportionment, where the amount of the claim is in dispute, since other adequate legal or equitable remedies exist.—Bay County Sup'rs v. Arenac County Sup'rs, 111 Mich. 105.

¶ 604. Mandamus denied to compel the state board of auditors to consider relator's claim for extra services in compiling the statutes.—People ex rel. Dewey v. Board of State Auditors, 32 Mich. 191.

¶ 605. Mandamus will not lie against a public board at the suit of an employee thereof for redress for a breach of contract, but he may have a claim for damages.—Portman v. State Board of Fish Com'rs, 50 Mich. 258.

¶ 606. Under Comp. L. 1897, § 12, providing compensation for clerks and assistants of the House of Representatives and Senate and including 10c for every mile actually traveled, and section 13 prescribing what officers shall certify and that the auditor shall countersign the certificate for compensation, the auditor has the duty of determining the proper allowance and cannot be compelled by mandamus to countersign certificates made by the proper officer including mileage when there has been no actual travel.—Cook v. Auditor General, 129 Mich. 48.

¶ 607. The fact that the legislature has for many years fixed the amount of mileage for its employees and members does not make it compulsory on the auditor general to countersign certificates for such mileage when wrongfully allowed, as by Comp. L. 1897, § 12, mileage is allowed only for actual travel and by section 13 a certificate must be countersigned by the auditor.—Cook v. Auditor General, 129 Mich. 48.

Mandamus as proper remedy to compel payment of health department expenses, see also Health ¶ 73.

Denial of writ to compel audit of claim because payment without vote of electors would be unlawful, see also Counties ¶ 107.

¶ 609. Mandamus lies to compel a board of supervisors to allow a claim that is by law made a charge upon the county.—People ex rel. Bristow v. Macomb County Sup'rs, 3 Mich. 475; People ex rel. Schmittdiel v. Wayne County Auditors, 13 Mich. 233.

¶ 610. The board of auditors cannot be compelled by mandamus to allow a demand rejected by it on the ground of nonperformance of the services charged for.—People ex rel. Kuhn v. Wayne County Auditors, 10 Mich. 307.

¶ 611. Mandamus will not lie to control the action of the supervisors, when they have only used their lawful discretion, e. g., where their determination is conclusive not only as to the propriety of making an allowance, but as to the amount.—People ex rel. Mixer v. Manistee County Sup'rs, 26 Mich. 422.

¶ 612. On mandamus to compel the Wayne County Auditors to audit and allow a claim for services rendered by the sheriff where the evidence shows that the claim was disallowed in toto, on advice of counsel that the auditors had no power to audit and allow the claim, the board will be compelled to act if there is any item of the claim which they had power to allow.—Chipman v. Wayne County Auditors, 127 Mich. 490.

¶ 613. Mandamus was denied on an application to require the supervisors to audit and allow an attorney fee of $10, taxed by the justice but not collected, where the prosecution under the prohibitory liquor-law was instituted by a private citizen and the attorney was not the prosecuting attorney, and where the supervisors had prescribed no rule in advance, but in acting upon the claim afterwards had allowed the relator $2 and refused to allow any more.—People ex rel. Videto v. Jackson County Sup'rs, 31 Mich. 116.

¶ 614. A sheriff, without first obtaining the authority of the supervisors for the purpose, employed a night watchman for the jail and boarded him at the jail while he was so employed. The board of supervisors paid the watchman, and the sheriff then presented a bill against the county for boarding him. This bill the board refused to allow. The sheriff also hired an office for himself, claiming that the one provided by the county was wholly insufficient and unsuitable, and, also, that his action was sanctioned by a committee of the board of supervisors. The board refused to allow his bill for the rent. Held, that such bills are within the exclusive discretion of the board, and that allowance thereof cannot be compelled by mandamus.—Peck v. Kent County Supervisors, 47 Mich. 477.

¶ 615. Mandamus will not be granted to compel the board of supervisors to audit and allow the county clerk's fees for issuing subpoenas to delinquent taxpayers.—Sherman v. Sanilac County Sup'rs, 84 Mich. 108.

¶ 616. Mandamus lies to compel the board of auditors of Wayne County to allow the expenses necessarily incurred by the board of health of a township in providing for the safety of its inhabitants by removing, etc., any indigent person infected with a contagious disease.—People ex rel. Bristow v. Macomb County Supervisors, 3 Mich. 475.

¶ 617. Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel a board of supervisors to allow a physician's account for services rendered during an epidemic under direction of the board of health, which account the board has certified to be correct.—McKillop v. Cheboygan County Sup'rs, 116 Mich. 614.

¶ 618. Mandamus will lie to compel a public board to award compensation for damages resulting from its official action, where the duty to pass upon the amount of compensation is established, and it refuses to make any award.—Safford v. Detroit Board of Health, 110 Mich. 81.

¶ 619. Mandamus was the proper remedy for a claimant for services rendered to the city of Detroit at the request of the board of health to compel such board to audit such claim, as provided in Local Acts 1897, No. 413; and until such claim was so audited claimant had no remedy at law.—Boyd v. Detroit Board of Health, 140 Mich. 306.

¶ 620. In mandamus by the Board of Water Commissioners of Detroit to compel the Commissioners of Parks and Boulevards to audit an account for water furnished, Long and Grant, JJ., hold the writ should issue, notwithstanding the board of estimates made no provision for raising the money necessary to pay for the water and that the council may refuse to pay; Hooker, J., holds that the writ should be denied on the ground that there was no appropriation and the park board is prohibited from incurring obligations beyond appropriation; Montgomery, C. J., and Moore, J., hold the writ should be denied because the board of water commissioners are bound to furnish water free.—Board of Water Commissioners of Detroit v. Commissioners of Parks and Boulevards, 126 Mich. 459.

¶ 621. Assumpsit and not mandamus lies in favor of the director of a school district upon a disputed claim against the district which the moderator and assessor have declined to pass upon as an entirety.—Van Wert v. Adams Township School Dist. No. 8, 100 Mich. 382.

To compel allowance and payment of claims made binding on county by law, see also Counties ¶ 175.
Mandamus to compel payment of drain order, see Drains § 54.

¶ 622. Mandamus for the payment of money can issue at the instance of one municipal corporation against another only when there are statutory or legal relations between them to authorize it, and the obligation to pay has been legally liquidated.—Midland School Dist. No. 9 v. Midland School Dist. No. 5, 40 Mich. 551.

¶ 623. In order that the payment of a claim by a municipal corporation may be enforced by mandamus it is essential that the amount thereof shall have been determined either by judgment, statute, authorized officer or board, or by agreement between the parties.—Waterman-Waterbury Co. v. Cato Township School Dist. No. 4, 183 Mich. 168.

¶ 624. Mandamus is the proper remedy to enforce the payment of city orders drawn upon a specific fund, where the fund is supplied.—Second Nat. Bank v. City of Lansing, 25 Mich. 207.

¶ 625. Mandamus is the remedy against a municipal corporation for its improper refusal to pay orders properly drawn upon it for the payment of liquidated claims.—Peterson v. City of Manistee, 36 Mich. 8.

¶ 626. Mandamus does not lie to compel a city to pay an unliquidated demand, such as a claim on a quantum meruit for the value to the city of services performed and materials furnished on a contract which was afterwards forfeited.—People ex rel. Michigan Paving Co. v. Detroit Common Council, 34 Mich. 201.

¶ 627. Mandamus against the town officers in case of their neglect to do their duty is the proper remedy to compel the payment of an established demand against a township.—Township of Dayton v. Rounds, 27 Mich. 82.

¶ 628. Mandamus, and not an action against the township, is the proper remedy to enforce payment of orders regularly drawn by the highway commissioners upon the township treasurer.—McArthur v. Township of Duncan, 34 Mich. 27; Just v. Township of Wise, 42 Mich. 573.

¶ 629. Mandamus lies to compel a school-district moderator to countersign order on township treasurer.—People ex rel. Burns v. Bender, 36 Mich. 195.

¶ 630. Mandamus to compel a school-district assessor to pay a school order was allowed where the court was satisfied there was no valid defense.—Martin v. Tripp, 51 Mich. 184.

¶ 631. Mandamus was granted to compel a board of supervisors to provide for the payment of a balance credited upon the books of the county to a certain township which belonged, with another, to a county set off from the first, the credit having been made in pursuance of a mutual agreement between the townships and the county indebted.—Township of Higgins v. Midland County Sup'rs, 52 Mich. 16.

¶ 632. The Wayne county board of auditors may be compelled by mandamus to refund a fine, the judgment under which it was imposed having been reversed on certiorari, and the fine having been paid to avoid imprisonment.—McMahon v. Wayne Auditors, 41 Mich. 223.

¶ 633. Mandamus to compel a common council to order payment of a judgment against the city denied, relator's proper course being to proceed under the statute requiring judgments so recovered to be spread upon the tax-roll.—Griswold v. Common Council of Ludington, 117 Mich. 317.

¶ 634. A judgment in condemnation proceedings to open a street in Detroit which had become final may be enforced by mandamus directing the city to pay the amount awarded from funds already in its hands, or, if that cannot be done, to proceed to levy an assessment for that purpose, under the general law in force before the passage of Local Acts 1895, No. 467, which provided a procedure specially applicable to that city.—Balch v. City of Detroit, 109 Mich. 253.

Legislative employees, see also ante § 91.
Of legislative employees, see also ante § 91.
Mandamus to judge to allow coroner's fee bill, see ante ¶ 366.
Invalidity in or objection to claim as bar to the writ, see post § 95, and see also ante § 11.

¶ 635. Mandamus is the proper remedy to enforce the payment by a municipal corporation of an official salary, the amount of which is fixed.—McBride v. City of Grand Rapids, 47 Mich. 236; Speed v. Common Council of Detroit, 100 Mich. 92; Granger v. French, 152 Mich. 356; Chase v. Hart, 162 Mich. 74.

¶ 635a. The fact that the general fund, out of which salaries are usually payable, has been overdrawn, will not prevent the issue of a mandamus to compel the payment of a fixed salary, where it appears that the amount of uncollected taxes is largely in excess of said overdraft, and that the city council has authorized a loan in anticipation of the collection of said taxes, and that the salary in question has not been anticipated in the annual budget, and is therefore contingent, and, under the charter, payable out of the contingent fund, which is amply sufficient for that purpose.—Speed v. Common Council of Detroit, 100 Mich. 92.

¶ 636. Where a board of park commissioners declines to authenticate the demand of an engineer for services, and the common council regards the action as final and therefore refuses to allow the claim, the only way that the claim can be liquidated is by suit, and mandamus will not lie to compel payment of the claim.—Bloomshield v. City of Bay City, 192 Mich. 488.

¶ 637. Where a board of park commissioners performs its legal duty by authenticating the claim of an engineer for services so that the demand becomes liquidated, payment by the city can be enforced only in mandamus proceedings.—Bloomshield v. City of Bay City, 192 Mich. 488.

¶ 638. Mandamus will not lie to compel the payment of an assistant visitor of schools for services under Laws 1891, Act No. 147, where the commissioner has not determined the assistant's compensation, as required by section 10 of the act.—Hicks v. Board of Auditors of Wayne County, 97 Mich. 611.

¶ 639. Mandamus is not the proper remedy to secure payment for services rendered after hours by a clerk in a municipal office.—Goodson v. Detroit Board of Health, 114 Mich. 345.

¶ 640. Where the court has, in a previous mandamus proceeding brought by the police commissioners of a city, ordered the mayor and common council to make an appropriation for the support of the police department, the court will sustain a mandamus proceeding to compel the mayor and council to allow the pay roll presented by the police department, in pursuance of the appropriation ordered.—Board Police Com'rs City of Wyandotte v. Mayor & Common Council of Wyandotte, 154 Mich. 495.

¶ 641. Respondent hired relator to teach in the public schools for one year, beginning in September. On December 18th she was served with a copy of a resolution adopted by the committee on teachers, which provided that she be relieved from further duty pending the action of the school board. At its next meeting the board approved of the committee's action, and provided that the release from duty be continued during the term for which she had a contract with the board. The relator's salary was paid to January 1st, but at the meeting of the board in January it was resolved to discontinue it. Mandamus proceedings were thereafter instituted to compel the payment of the salary fixed by the contract. Respondent answered, claiming that it had discharged the relator in the exercise of its power to discharge teachers for good and sufficient reasons. Held, that mandamus was improperly granted, for the reason that the usual action at law afforded an adequate remedy.—Coffin v. Board of Education of Detroit, 114 Mich. 342.

Estoppel to enforce claim against fund, see also ante ¶ 64.

¶ 642. Mandamus to compel one municipality to pay an indebtedness to another as agreed upon by representatives of both was denied where the proceedings to determine the debt did not clearly appear to be those prescribed by statute. (Local L. 1883, Act No. 38.)—Portsmouth Township v. Bay City, 57 Mich. 420.

¶ 643. Mandamus will not lie to compel the auditor general to pay a bill of inquest allowed by the circuit court, where such bill contains illegal items on its face.—Edwards v. Auditor General, 161 Mich. 639.

¶ 644. Mandamus was granted to compel payment of a proper order made upon the township treasurer by a commissioner of highways who was performing the duties of his office though he had not filed an official bond.—Mackenzie v. Baraga Township Treasurer, 39 Mich. 554.

¶ 645. Mandamus will lie to compel the county treasurer to honor an order of the supervisors to pay a de facto supervisor without passing upon the question of title to the office in dispute.—Friedman v. Horning, 128 Mich. 606.

¶ 646. Mandamus lies to compel a township treasurer to pay to relator so much of the money in his hands as is covered by the warrant of a school director drawn in relator's favor and in proper form, even though it does not specify a precise sum, but is for all such money in his hands as was raised for the purposes of the school district and belonged thereto.—Bryant v. Moore, 50 Mich. 225.

¶ 647. Mandamus should not issue to compel the payment of a municipal warrant, where the city objects to such payment on the ground that the warrant was issued as an advance payment on a contract which had not been performed and which the contractor had failed since issuance to perform as agreed, and that there is a remedy open to the contractor by action upon the bond given to secure payment for the work, in which the city's defense may be asserted.—Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Village of Highland Park, 156 Mich. 178.

¶ 648. Mandamus to compel a township supervisor to sign a warrant for the purchase of site for a town hall where no contract exists, should be denied.—Wilhelm v. Fagan, 90 Mich. 6.

¶ 649. Mandamus will not lie to compel the common council of Grand Rapids to order the payment of invalid claims certified by the board of police commissioners under a contract by said board for the board of persons who are to testify for the people in a criminal prosecution.—Tucker v. Grand Rapids Common Council of Grand Rapids, 104 Mich. 621.

¶ 650. Upon mandamus to compel a village president to sign orders for payment of one hired to look after city property, the failure to observe certain formalities in the presentation of the account to the council will not prevent the issuing of the writ where the president put his refusal on other grounds.—Clapp v. Titus, 138 Mich. 41.

¶ 651. In mandamus by the board of road commissioners to compel the board of county officers and the county treasurer to audit and pay a warrant on the road fund, where proceedings are pending to try their title to office, and great confusion might result if it were held that warrants drawn by them must be paid, their right to office being a serious question, courts are clothed with considerable discretion in determining whether or not a mandamus should issue.—Board of Road Com'rs of Wayne County v. Board of Auditors of Wayne County, 148 Mich. 255.

¶ 652. Mandamus to compel a village to levy a special assessment to pay certain warrants due on a contract between the parties respecting the relinquishment of certain rights of the plank road company within the village limits under Pub. Acts 1903, No. 159, will not issue during the pendency of an action brought by taxpayers against both parties where the principal contention is that the contract between them and the warrants issued under it are invalid, and both parties are enjoined from doing anything thereunder.—Detroit & Birmingham Plank Road Co. v. Village of Highland Park, 142 Mich. 326.

¶ 653. Mandamus is properly refused to compel a township to levy a tax to pay for a road machine bought under the provisions of Comp. L. 1897, §§ 4193, 4194, when it appears that the signatures to the petition were fraudulently procured by the town clerk; and it matters not that the road machine had been delivered to the district and used by it, and that one instalment had been paid before the fraud had been discovered.—Indiana Road Machine Co. v. Keeney, 147 Mich. 184.

¶ 654. Even though mandamus is the only remedy open and the issuance of it is discretionary, it cannot be allowed to a relator to compel township officers to levy tax to pay for a road machine on a record showing fraud on relator's part in procuring a contract to purchase the machine under form of law, but void because the law was not complied with.—Indiana Road Machine Co. v. Keeney, 147 Mich. 184.

Invalidity in claim or objection thereto as bar to writ, see ante § 95.

¶ 655. When a demand against a municipal corporation is liquidated, and evidenced by a proper warrant upon a proper officer, requiring upon the part of such officer the official action of paying it, such action, there being funds, may be compelled by mandamus.—Ullman v. Sandell, 158 Mich. 496.

¶ 656. Mandamus to compel a township treasurer to pay a certain sum upon the order of the township board was withheld where the treasurer set forth in his return to the order to show cause that the township had by resolution directed him not to pay, and that there were no moneys in his hands with which to pay.—Murphy v. Reeder Township Treasurer, 56 Mich. 505.

¶ 657. Section 251 of the City Charter of Detroit required that, in order to make valid a contract for expenditure for any public work, a certificate by the controller that the money was in the treasury, or appropriated therefor, should be indorsed thereon. Held that, in the absence of such certificate, and of any fund for the purpose, mandamus would not lie to compel the controller to issue a warrant for the payment of work completed in building sidewalk intersections, despite the approval by the council of the work done.—Garner v. Doremus, 154 Mich. 328.

¶ 658. Where no provision has been made, by taxation or by issuing bonds as required by a city charter, for the payment of an indebtedness contracted for a city hall site, mandamus will not lie to compel the mayor to sign a warrant on the city treasury to pay such indebtedness.—Niles Bryant School of Piano Tuning v. Bailey, 161 Mich. 193.

Impropriety of mandamus to try title to warrant, see post ¶ 900.

Alleging uncertainty of title to warrant as defense, see post § 144.

¶ 659. Mandamus may be granted to compel the board of auditors of Wayne county to deliver their warrant on the county treasurer to the person in whose favor an account has been allowed. And it is no answer to the application that such a warrant was made out, but, before delivery, was taken on execution against the payee, and the money received thereon by the officer from the county treasurer,—such a warrant not being the subject of levy on execution.—People ex rel. Martin v. Wayne County Auditors, 5 Mich. 223.

¶ 660. One Norman held a warrant upon the treasurer of a township for work and labor rendered. A creditor of Norman garnisheed the township and secured judgment. Held, mandamus by a transferee of the warrant would not lie against the treasurer to order him to pay to said indorsee the amount of the warrant.—Ullman v. Sandell, 158 Mich. 496.

¶ 661. Mandamus will not lie, since Laws 1887, Act No. 142, to compel the auditor general to issue a warrant for the payment to a county of the money collected under Laws 1885, Act No. 222, to pay the interest money due under How. St. § 5394 on sales of swamp lands.—Sanilac County Sup'rs v. Auditor General, 68 Mich. 659.

¶ 662. Mandamus lies to compel the auditor general to draw his warrant upon the state treasury for the account—allowed by the circuit court—of a justice of the peace for expenses incurred in holding an inquest over the dead body of a stranger under How. St. § 9593.—Lachance v. Auditor General, 77 Mich. 563.

¶ 663. Mandamus will not lie to compel the auditor general to draw his warrant on the state treasury in payment of the war bounty of $100 due a soldier under Laws 1864, Act No. 23, there being no money in the treasury out of which such warrant could be lawfully paid, and none appropriated for that purpose.—Smith v. Aplin, Auditor General, 80 Mich. 205.

Payment of claims against the public, see ante § 93 et seq.
Compelling payment for road machines, see also ante § 95.
Impropriety of mandamus to enforce mere contract, see also ante ¶ 110.
Delay and intervening performance of contract as bar to mandamus to let to other lower bidder, see also ante ¶¶ 93, 94.
Proper persons to be relators, see post § 127.
Proper remedy for enforcement of contracts and debts of municipalities, see Municipal Corporations, XVI, A; Municipal Bonds, VI; Townships, VIII.

¶ 664. The state board of auditors called for proposals for all kinds of printing as one bid, without any estimate of the different kinds of work, and without indicating any basis on which the board might determine who was lowest bidder. The relator and others sent in bids, and the board awarded the contract to another than the relator, professing to ascertain which bid was lowest by taking as a basis the printing for the two preceding years. The relator, on a showing that the public and the bidders had no means of making estimates on such a basis, and no reason to suppose it was to be adopted, and on a claim that its bid on any fair estimate was lowest, and that the letting was void, applied for a mandamus to compel the board to invite new proposals. On the showing, it appearing that the board had followed the practice of its predecessors. Held: (1) That as there was nothing to impeach the good faith of the board, and as there was no reason to believe the difference in favor of relator's bid, if any, was insignificant, the court on that ground might decline to interfere. (2) That the relator, having participated in the lettings and made no objections until after the board had announced its decision, was not then in position to dispute, in his own interest, the validity of the previous action. (3) That the court might properly refuse to interfere by mandamus, since the effect might be indirectly to annul a contract; and mandamus is not a proper proceeding for that purpose.—Detroit Free Press Co. v. State Board of Auditors, 47 Mich. 135.

¶ 665. The writ of mandamus is not ordinarily designed as a remedy for the collection of debts, and will not lie to enforce the private contracts of municipalities.—Waterman-Waterbury Co. v. Cato Township School Dist. No. 4, 183 Mich. 168.

Proper officer to issue patents, see ante ¶ 516.
Rights and duties in respect to the public lands, see Public Lands.

¶ 666. Mandamus was granted to compel the commissioner of the state land office to issue certificates of purchase pursuant to application and tender.—People ex rel. Parkhurst v. Pritchard, 17 Mich. 338.

¶ 667. The writ issued to compel the commissioner of public lands to issue patents to a county for selections of swamp lands appropriated to it by statute for the construction of a state road.—People ex rel. County of Houghton v. State Land Office Com'r, 23 Mich. 270.

¶ 668. Mandamus lies to compel the state land office commissioner to issue a certificate entitling a purchaser of state swamp lands to a deed, although the taxes have not been paid.—Robertson v. State Land Office Com'r, 44 Mich. 274.

¶ 669. Mandamus will not issue to compel the state land commissioner to sell, in 1872, at an appraisal made in 1850, school lands conveyed by void deed in 1850.—People ex rel. Chapman v. State Land Office Com'r, 26 Mich. 146.

¶ 670. Where the evidence is conflicting as to the character of land as submerged land, within the intent of the Swamp Land Act of 1850 (9 U. S. Stat. 519), mandamus will not issue to permit its location as swamp land.—Olds v. Commissioner State Land Office, 150 Mich. 134.

¶ 671. Mandamus will not lie to compel the commissioner of the state land office to issue a certificate showing a homestead entry where the return shows that the commissioner was satisfied that the application to homestead was not made in good faith since the General Tax Law, § 131, vests in him a discretion and requires him to issue the certificate only when "in his judgment the application is made in good faith."—Beebe v. Commissioner of State Land Office, 137 Mich. 48.

Necessary respondents, see post ¶ 798.
General law as to plats and dedication, see Dedication.
To compel approval of submitted plat, see also Dedication ¶ 86.

¶ 672. The commissioner of public works of Detroit may be compelled, by mandamus, to approve a plat of land within the city though the plat does not include nor dedicate land lying within the limits of proposed streets between parcels of land platted.—Owen v. Moreland, 132 Mich. 477.

¶ 673. Under Pub. Acts 1915, No. 251, where a proposed plat conforms to streets and alleys of adjoining plats and does not interfere with any general plan for streets, the plattor is entitled to an approval and if it is disapproved by the board of county auditors because relator has not provided for, and has refused to provide for, a certain street across his land, mandamus will issue to compel the approval of such plat by a board of county auditors.—Campau v. Wayne County Board of Auditors, 198 Mich. 468.

Mandamus to review certiorari proceedings against highway commissioner, see ante ¶ 444.
Proper persons to be relators, see post § 127.
Necessary respondents, see post § 130.
Necessity and sufficiency of allegations, see post ¶ 816.
Compelling erection and repair of bridges over highways, see also Bridges § 27.
General law of highways and bridges, see Highways; Bridges.

¶ 674. Mandamus does not lie to compel a board of supervisors to take action for the construction of a bridge over a navigable stream between townships.—Osborne v. Lindow, China Township Sup'r, 78 Mich. 606. See Township Board of Ecorse v. Wayne Township Sup'rs, 75 Mich. 264.

¶ 675. On the petition of private citizens, the circuit court has the power to mandamus the township highway commissioners to rebuild a bridge where the necessary appropriation is within the power of the commissioners and the road has never been vacated.—Brophy v. Schindler, 126 Mich. 341.

¶ 676. A township board will not be compelled by mandamus to repair a public bridge.—Perrine v. Hamlin Tp. Board, 48 Mich. 641.

¶ 677. Highway commissioners will not, under Comp. L. 1871, § 1306 (How. St. § 1379), be compelled by mandamus to cause a bridge that has been destroyed to be replaced where the cost greatly exceeds the amount prescribed by the statute. And where the cost is within the statutory sum, whether prosecution for misbehavior in office would not be the proper remedy for refusal to act, quære.—People ex rel. Goodsell v. Post, 30 Mich. 358.

¶ 678. Repair of a bridge by a highway commissioner will not be compelled by mandamus where his return shows that in his opinion the cost of repairing will exceed $1,000, the limit of the amount which the statute permits him to expend for repairs in one year; under How. St. § 1331, his opinion controls.—Travis v. Skinner, 72 Mich. 152.

¶ 679. Mandamus will not issue to compel two adjoining counties to rebuild a bridge over a stream between them upon its former site, where the legislature has by special act authorized the counties to rebuild upon a site to be selected by the boards of supervisors of the two counties, though the two boards have failed to agree upon a site.—Attorney General v. Board of Supervisors of Kalkaska and Antrim Counties, 120 Mich. 357.

¶ 680. Mandamus was not properly issued to compel a highway commissioner to repair a bridge, where there was a serious dispute as to whether the bridge could be made reasonably safe by an expenditure within the power of the highway commissioner and township board to make.—Kingsley v. Nyland, 136 Mich. 535.

Compelling payment of claims, see ante § 93 et seq.
Sufficiency of relator's interest to sustain the writ, see post § 126.
Sufficiency of allegations, see post ¶ 817.

¶ 681. Mandamus may issue on petition of a school district against the superintendent of public instruction to compel such superintendent to include proper children of school age in the census as a basis for the apportionment of primary school funds without costs to either party.—Public Schools of City of Muskegon v. Wright, 176 Mich. 6.

¶ 682. Mandamus granted to compel the reinstatement in a public school of relator's son who had negligently broken a window-pane in the school-building.—Holman v. Avon Township School Dist. No. 5, 77 Mich. 605.

¶ 683. The action of the superintendent of public instruction in striking the names of children from the census list of a school district in making the apportionment of the primary school fund, as provided by Comp. L. 1897, secs. 4642-4644, How. St., 2nd Ed., §§ 9863-9865, is subject to review by mandamus.—Public Schools of City of Muskegon v. Wright, 176 Mich. 6.

¶ 684. Where a school district under Act 83, Pub. Acts 1909, sec. 20, sub-sec. 11, How. 2nd Ed., § 9886, discontinues its school, relator, who resides in the district and has two children of school age, will be granted a writ of mandamus compelling the school board to provide transportation for his children to and from the school house in the adjoining district.—Dennis v. Wrigley, 175 Mich. 621.

Compelling clerk to deliver transcript of testimony, see ante ¶ 392.
Compelling filing of papers to admit of taking certiorari, see ante ¶ 525; see also Drains § 119.
Compelling access to private record required by law, see post ¶ 714.
Proper relator to compel acceptance of instruments for filing, see post ¶ 783.
Allegations in petition for writ, see post ¶ 819.
Incidental trial of title of relator and respondent to office, see ante § 20.

¶ 685. Under Comp. L. 1897, § 2731, providing that the village clerk shall be clerk of the council, attend its meetings and record all the proceedings, a clerk may be compelled to enter the record of council proceedings as authenticated by the president and he cannot refuse on the ground that the member of the council purporting to have acted as clerk pro tem was not actually present at the council meeting; it is the province of the council alone to determine the correctness of the record.—People ex rel. Cady v. Ihnken, 129 Mich. 466.

¶ 686. Mandamus is not the proper remedy to compel a county clerk to return to the supreme court files that have been remitted to him by mistake.—Wright v. Huron County Clerk, 48 Mich. 642.

¶ 687. Mandamus lies to compel a county treasurer to permit the inspection of liquor bonds filed in his office (How. St. § 9347).—Brown v. County Treasurer, 54 Mich. 132.

¶ 688. Mandamus does not lie at the suit of a grantee to compel a register of deeds to record a deed delivered to him in escrow and withheld by the grantor's order.—People ex rel. Austin v. Curtis, 41 Mich. 723.

¶ 689. Mandamus requiring a register of deeds to allow relators and their clerks to inspect and copy the records for the purpose of making a set of books of abstracts of title was refused.—Webber v. Townley, 43 Mich. 534.

¶ 690. A foreign corporation claiming to have and to be constantly purchasing large interests in lands in a certain county, and to need a complete system of abstracts for the sake of protecting its rights, was denied a mandamus to compel the register to allow it to copy the records, where it showed no charter power to deal in land titles.—Diamond Match Co. v. Powers, 51 Mich. 145.

¶ 691. Mandamus denied to compel a county clerk to furnish to a newspaper reporter for inspection and publication the record and files in a case suppressed on request of complainant's solicitor and not yet brought to hearing.—Schmeddling v. May, 85 Mich. 1.

¶ 692. Mandamus may properly be granted to compel a city treasurer to permit relator to examine sales-books of delinquent tax lands.—Burton v. Tuite, 78 Mich. 368.

Persons qualified as relators, see post ¶ 776.

¶ 693. The constitution provided that "No mechanical trade shall hereafter be taught to convicts in the state prison, in this state, except the making of those articles of which the chief supply for the consumption of the country is imported from other states or countries." What trades are within the spirit of this provision it is for the agent of the state prison to determine, and the supreme court cannot, on mandamus, control him in this regard.—People ex rel. Russell v. State Prison Inspectors, 4 Mich. 187.

See also ante ¶ 7.
Discretionary duties, see also ante § 81.
Illegality of license as bar to mandamus to compel it, see also ante § 11.
Mandamus to compel performance of duties relating to local option elections, see ante § 83.
Mandamus to review certiorari to board revoking license, see ante ¶ 443.
Necessity of allowing time for action before application, see also ante ¶ 514.
Allegations in petition for writ, see post ¶¶ 822, 823.
Sufficiency of allegations as to reasons for refusal, see post ¶ 828.

¶ 694. Mandamus will not issue to compel the approval of a liquor-dealer's bond by the council of a village organized under the general incorporation law of 1883, which empowers such villages to suppress saloons.—Post v. Village of Sparta, 58 Mich. 212.

¶ 695. Where the supreme court has rendered an opinion holding that relator has the right to a license for the wholesaling of liquors in a village, and the lower court then declines so to hold, mandamus will issue to compel the village council to issue the license.—Boos v. Scudder, 163 Mich. 678.

¶ 696. The respondent village was allowed by law to have a maximum of nine saloons. One Stivonski applied for the ninth license, but failed to file his bond in time. Before he reapplied, relator put in his application for said license and his application was rejected improperly on moral grounds and Stivonski's second application granted. Held, mandamus would lie to compel respondent to revoke Stivonski's license and to grant a license to relator.—Hanold v. Common Council Village of Stambaugh, 163 Mich. 242.

¶ 697. Mandamus to compel a city council to act upon an application for a liquor license is properly denied where it appears that the number of applications for retail liquor licenses exceeds the maximum number which can be issued, and that applicant's license was refused in good faith because of the character of saloon which applicant had previously conducted.—Frey v. Common Council City of Jackson, 167 Mich. 238.

¶ 698. A statute which provides that the board of trustees of a certain village is "authorized and empowered" to accept the bond of a surety company in lieu of the bond required of liquor dealers by the provisions of Pub. Acts 1887, Act No. 313, is not mandatory, and mandamus will not lie to compel the acceptance of such a bond.—Hicks v. Perry Board of Trustees, 151 Mich. 88.

¶ 699. Mandamus will lie to compel a village council to approve a liquor dealer's bond, where such dealer has complied with the requirements of the statute and where no material facts are shown by such council as ground for the refusal to approve such bond.—Potter v. Common Council of Village of Homer, 59 Mich. 8.

¶ 700. The determination of a board of trustees of a village, refusing to approve a liquor bond, will not be reversed by mandamus, where the board has acted in good faith, instead of arbitrarily, there being a fair question as to whether conveyances to one of the sureties were made for the purpose of enabling him to become a surety, and there being a difference in opinion as to whether such surety was of financial ability to act as bondsman.—Divine v. Board of Trustees of Village of Lakeview, 121 Mich. 433.

¶ 701. Mandamus will not be granted to compel a village board of trustees to rescind the approval of a liquor bond, under the claim that a sufficient investigation was not made as to the financial responsibility of the sureties, where the trustees had in good faith by a majority vote approved the bond. —Briggs v. McKinley, 131 Mich. 154.

¶ 702. The judgment of a board of village trustees as to the sufficiency of a liquor bond was not final, under Comp. L. 1897, § 5386, and the trial court, having on mandamus found bad faith and arbitrary action on the part of the trustees in refusing to approve the bond, its finding was affirmed.—Farr v. Anderson, 135 Mich. 485.

¶ 703. Where a township board has come to a deliberate conclusion on the testimony concerning the pecuniary responsibility of a surety in a liquor bond, mandamus will not lie to review the judgment thus exercised.— Wolfson v. Rubicon Township Board, 63 Mich. 49.

¶ 704. Mandamus to compel a village board to approve a liquor bond will be denied where a surety thereon was irresponsible.—Palmer v. President, etc., Village of Hartford, 73 Mich. 96.

¶ 705. Under a franchise for the construction of a street railway in various villages and townships of a county, where the fair inference from the record was that the line in question was contemplated as finally constructed, and that the franchise granted to the company the right to make connections at some convenient and proper place, the common council was required by mandamus to permit the making of the connection in question.—Houghton County St. Ry. Co. v. Common Council of Village of Laurium, 135 Mich. 614.

¶ 706. Under an ordinance granting the right to use streets, lanes and alleys for laying and maintaining gas pipes subject to rules and regulations prescribed by the city council, with a further provision that "said main pipes shall be laid in alleys whenever practicable and when so ordered by the council" and that permission from the council must be obtained before pipes are laid, mandamus will not, in the absence of a showing that laying pipes in alleys is not practicable, lie to compel the council to meet and grant the right to lay pipes in the street instead of in the alleys, since the council has power to require the main pipes to be laid in the alleys though this is more expensive and less convenient for the gas company.— Traverse City Gas Co. v. Mayor, etc., City of Traverse City, 130 Mich. 17.

Necessity of right in relator, see also ante § 6, ¶ 31.

Duty to admit foreign investment corporation, see also Banking ¶ 5.

¶ 707. Mandamus to compel the secretary of state to file articles of association of a foreign corporation organized not only to carry on a mining business but for other purposes not covered by How. St., ch. 123, was denied.—Isle Royale Land Corporation v. Osmun, 76 Mich. 162.

¶ 708. Mandamus will not issue to compel the Secretary of State to file articles of association of a foreign mercantile tontine company, where subsequent to the institution of the proceedings, a law was passed abrogating the rights claimed by the company under the law as it stood before the passage of such act.—Preferred Tontine Merc. Co. v. Secretary of State, 133 Mich. 395.

¶ 709. Where it appears on the record that a life insurance company is not complying with the law the discretionary writ of mandamus cannot be had of right to compel the commissioner of insurance to issue a certificate reviewing the relator's authority to do business.—Citizens' Life Ins. Co. v. Commissioner of Insurance, 128 Mich. 85.

Mandamus to compel compliance by corporation to rate regulations, see post §§ 111, 112.

Compelling judicial action in rate cases, see ante II.

Mandamus to put order of Railroad Commission into force pending Federal suit to vacate same, see Abatement ¶ 50.

¶ 710. Where the Michigan Railroad Commission orders a steam railroad company to install a connection with an interurban railway, and said railroad fails to institute proceedings to test the validity of said order by chancery proceedings within the time limited by Act 312, Pub. Acts 1907, § 26, the supreme court will not on mandamus review questions relating to the practicability of the physical connection and interchange of traffic ordered or the reasonableness of the service required.—Michigan Railroad Commission v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 168 Mich. 230, aff'd in 236 U. S. 615, 59 L. ed. 750, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 422.

¶ 711. Mandamus denied to review the discretion of the attorney general in refusing to file an information in the nature of a quo warranto against a corporation.—People ex rel. Yates v. Attorney General, 41 Mich. 728.

¶ 712. Whether the writ would, under any circumstances, be issued to compel the attorney general to file an information against his own judgment, quære.—Coon v. Attorney General, 42 Mich. 65.

IV. COMPULSION OF PRIVATE CORPORATIONS' AND INDIVIDUALS' DUTIES.

[Note. For a treatment of the general duties and rights pertaining to corporations, see Corporations; Foreign Corporations; Fraternal Associations; Insurance; Religious Societies; Railroads; Street Railways; Carriers.]

Original or appellate nature of mandamus, see ante § 2.

Necessity of duty, right to performance, exigency or benefit, efficaciousness, and equity or legality to support issuance of writ, see ante § 4 et seq.

Propriety of mandamus to coerce performance of private duties, see also ante § 19.

Corporate duties, see post §§ 111-118.

Duties of corporate officers, see post § 119.

Duties of foreign corporations, see post § 120.

Duties of joint stock companies (partnership associations), see post § 121.

Duties of representatives and trustees, see post § 122.

Procedure for issuance of the writ and on the writ, see post V.

Mandamus as remedy to compel escrow depositary to act, see Escrows § 9.

¶ 713. The general rule is that mandamus will not run against a private individual.—Thomas v. Hamilton, 101 Mich. 387.

¶ 714. Mandamus will not lie, at the instance of a private individual, to compel a druggist to allow relator to examine the record of sales of liquor which the druggist is required by the statute to keep, the same to be open for examination to all persons during business hours.—Thomas v. Hamilton, 101 Mich. 387.

¶ 715. Mandamus does not lie to compel a private corporation to perform contract obligations; hence it will not lie at the instance of a student to compel an incorporated institution of learning to continue him as such, in accordance with the terms of the implied agreement by which he was received.—Booker v. Grand Rapids Medical College, 156 Mich. 95.

¶ 716. Where a fund has been mistakenly paid by a city collector to the county treasurer, so that he does not legally hold it as county treasurer, mandamus lies against him individually to restore it.—Webster v. Wheeler, 119 Mich. 601.

Duties to members or private persons, see post §§ 112-116.

Duties of corporate officers, see post § 119.

Duties of foreign corporations, see post § 120.

Original or succeeding corporation as respondent, see post § 131.

Effect of appeal from order of the Railroad Commission to suspend duty to put rate regulation into effect, see Public Service.

¶ 717. A mandamus will be granted on behalf of the insurance department to compel an insurance company to submit to an inspection of its affairs.—People ex rel. Secretary of State v. State Ins. Co., 19 Mich. 392.

¶ 718. Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel a street railway company to repave the street between its tracks, obedient to an order made in pursuance of a reserved power in the ordinance granting its franchise and prescribing the conditions thereof.—Lansing v. Electric St. R. Co., 109 Mich. 123.

¶ 719. Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel a street railway to comply with the conditions of its franchise obtained from a township under Comp. L. 1897, § 6446, such condition being as binding as if imposed by statute.—Township of Grosse Pointe v. Detroit & L. St. C. Ry., 130 Mich. 363.

¶ 720. A provision of a franchise granted by a city to an interstate electric railway, requiring it to maintain a specified car service, may be enforced by mandamus.—City of Monroe v. Detroit, M. & T. S. L. Ry., 187 Mich. 364.

¶ 721. Where a township has granted a franchise to an interurban railway with certain regulations contained therein, and accepted by said railway, with respect to the stopping of cars and the rates of fare to be charged, the township may properly bring mandamus in the circuit court to compel the observance of said regulations. (Hooker, Moore, Brooke, and Stone, JJ., dissenting.)—Township of Ross v. Michigan United Rys. Co., 165 Mich. 28.

¶ 722. A suit in mandamus by a township to compel an interurban railway to conform to the provision of a franchise relating to rates is not open to the objection that in asking the court to compel the railway to charge not in excess of a specified rate, it is seeking injunctive relief. (Hooker, Moore, Brooke and Stone, JJ., dissenting.)—Township of Ross v. Michigan United Rys. Co., 165 Mich. 28.

¶ 723. A township granted a franchise to an interurban railway which was accepted by said railway and contained a provision that said railway should not charge more than two cents per mile for each passenger carried. Other townships through which said railway ran granted franchises containing the same provision and all said townships acted with knowledge that said provision was being incorporated in the franchise granted by each township. Said railway for a period of several years did not charge in excess of two cents per mile on any part of its line. It then proceeded to charge the rate of ten cents to passengers boarding its cars outside of the territory of the relator township and riding to a point within the limits of relator township, a distance of only three miles. Held, relator township was entitled by mandamus to prevent the respondent railway from charging over two cents a mile for carrying passengers over the said three-mile route.—Township of Ross v. Michigan United Rys. Co., 165 Mich. 28.

See also ante ¶ 715.

Various private duties and duties to members, see post §§ 113-116.

Internal rights and duties of corporations and their officers and members, see Corporations; Associations; Fraternal Associations; Religious Societies.

¶ 724. The supreme court will not interfere with the internal regulation of private corporations in the enforcement of their rules unless under very peculiar circumstances of substantial wrong.—Hargnell v. Lafayette Benevolent Society, 47 Mich. 648.

¶ 725. Mandamus is a discretionary writ and will not usually lie to settle the controversies of private corporations where the facts are not important on public grounds, or would not justify the interference of the court if corporate authority did not exist.—Lamphere v. Grand Lodge of United Workmen, 47 Mich. 429.

¶ 726. Mandamus is not a proper remedy to compel a private corporation to pay dividends which it has declared; still less when any other question exists as to the rights of the person claiming to be entitled to them.—People ex rel. Van Norman v. Central Car & Mfg. Co., 41 Mich. 166.

To compel compliance with terms of franchise, see ante § 111.

Public service duties, see Public Service: Carriers; Gas; Electricity; Railroads; Street Railways; Telegraphs; Waters, VI.

¶ 727. Mandamus is a proper remedy to compel a telephone company to furnish connections to a private person through its exchange as required by the ordinance under which it is operating.—Mahan v. Michigan Tel. Co., 132 Mich. 242.

Internal rights and duties of membership corporations, see Associations; Fraternal Associations; Religious Societies.

¶ 728. An incorporated voluntary society may be compelled by mandamus to restore to one of its members a substantial right of which he has been deprived by the action of the society in violation of its constitution.—People ex rel. Roehler v. Mechanics' Aid Soc., 22 Mich. 86.

¶ 729. The only ground on which the supreme court can interfere with organized bodies by mandamus in aid of a member is that, as corporations, they are subject to judicial oversight to prevent their depriving members of corporate privileges illegally. The writ will not lie where such bodies are not corporations, or where the question presented does not involve tangible and valuable corporate privileges.—Burt v. Michigan Grand Lodge of Free & Accepted Masons, 66 Mich. 85.

¶ 730. The purely social relations which members of a corporation hold, not by virtue of their corporate condition, but because of their connection with a general fraternal body, cannot be regulated by mandamus. So held where an incorporated Masonic lodge undertook to discipline by expulsion therefrom a Mason who had never belonged to that lodge.—Burt v. Michigan Grand Lodge of Free & Accepted Masons, 66 Mich. 85.

¶ 731. Mandamus granted to compel the recognition of a member of a subordinate lodge of the grand lodge of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, incorporated under Comp. L. 1871, § 2829 (How. St. § 3949), who had been suspended for refusing to pay a relief assessment made under the orders of the supreme lodge, a Kentucky corporation.—Lamphere v. Grand Lodge of United Workmen, 47 Mich. 429.

¶ 732. Mandamus to compel a religious corporation to restore to membership a person whom it had expelled was refused in the discretion of the court, where the society had no property and it would be destroyed if the relator were restored to membership, and where he had acted in hostility to its interests and given grounds for regular removal.—Meister v. Anshei Chesed Congregation of Bay City, 37 Mich. 542.

¶ 733. Mandamus lies to restore to membership in a Michigan corporation one who has been expelled for a nonpayment of a fine imposed upon him in consequence of his disobeying a resolution of a national body of which such corporation is a component.—Meurer v. Detroit Musicians' Benev. & Prot. Ass'n, 95 Mich. 451.

¶ 734. Mandamus lies to restore to membership in a mutual benefit society one who has been deprived thereof for nonpayment of a fine different from that authorized by the by-laws to be imposed for the acts complained of.—Meurer v. Detroit Musicians' Benev. & Prot. Ass'n, 95 Mich. 451.

¶ 735. Mandamus does not lie to compel a mutual benefit company to levy an assessment to pay the amount falling due upon the death of a member; the proper course is to bring suit upon the undertaking of the company; nor does it make any difference that the company has no funds to pay the judgment.—Burland v. Northwestern Mut. Ben. Ass'n, 47 Mich. 424; Bates v. Detroit Mut. Ben. Ass'n, 47 Mich. 646.

¶ 736. Mandamus will not lie to compel the officers of a mutual benefit association to levy an assessment on its members for the payment of a judgment rendered upon a certificate of membership. The remedy is in equity.—Miner v. Michigan Mut. Ben. Ass'n of Hillsdale, 65 Mich. 84.

To compel delivery of books and papers to successor in office, see post § 119.
Expiration of director's office as bar to mandamus by him, see ante § 6, ¶ 33.
Sufficiency of allegations, see post ¶ 827.
Mandamus to compel access to corporate books in aid of suit in Federal court, see also Corporations ¶ 683.
Right to inspect corporate books as affected by discontinuance of suit in which information was desired and institution of other suit in different court, see Corporations ¶ 683.

¶ 737. A corporator may apply for a mandamus to compel the custodian of the corporate records and documents to allow him an inspection of them. But he must show that he has made a proper demand for such inspection, at a proper time and place, and for a proper reason. The writ will not be granted to enable a corporator to gratify idle curiosity.—People ex rel. Bishop v. Walker, 9 Mich. 328.

¶ 737a. Mandamus lies to compel the secretary of a corporation to allow inspection of the books by a stockholder to ascertain if the assets have been secretly transferred to another corporation.—Eldred v. Elliott, 161 Mich. 262.

¶ 738. Mandamus is the proper remedy for compelling a corporation to allow a director to inspect the books and papers of the corporation.—Leach v. Davy, 199 Mich. 378.

§ 117. Duties of principal or grand and subsidiary associations.

Necessary respondents, see post § 130.
Compelling grand lodge of benefit society to vacate order revoking charter of local lodge, see also Fraternal Associations § 13.

¶ 739. The officers of a grand lodge organized under Comp. L. 1897, § 212, are subject to a writ of mandamus brought by a subordinate lodge to compel them to vacate an order revoking the relator's charter without proper ground.—Golden Star Lodge No. 1 v. Watterson, 158 Mich. 696.

¶ 740. Where a grand lodge has without cause revoked the charter of a subordinate lodge, and damages at law would be indefinite, mandamus will lie to vacate the order.—Golden Star Lodge No. 1 v. Watterson, 158 Mich. 696.

¶ 741. If a member of a corporation voluntarily subjects himself to arbitration, the supreme court will not undertake to review the action of extrajudicial bodies and intermeddle with their action in the course of delegated power.—Allnutt v. Subsidiary High Court of A. O. F., 62 Mich. 110.

¶ 742. A motion for an order to show cause why mandamus should not issue to compel the reinstatement of relator in a Masonic lodge from which he had been expelled was refused where he had previously appealed for redress to the tribunal established by the order for hearing such complaints and the expulsion had been confirmed.—Burt v. Grand Lodge of Free & Accepted Masons, 44 Mich. 208.

¶ 743. Mandamus will not lie to compel the reinstatement of a minister, who has been suspended from his office, on the ground that he had no proper notice of trial, where it appears that he had actual notice of the time and place of trial, and was present with his counsel, and participated therein.—Dempsey v. North Michigan Conference, 98 Mich. 444.

¶ 744. The interruption of relator and his witnesses, and the incidental irregularities of the trial before church tribunals are not subject to review in a mandamus proceeding to reinstate him as minister.—Dempsey v. North Michigan Conference, 98 Mich. 444.

Officers as respondents to mandamus against corporation, see post § 130.

Incumbent, succeeding, or preceding officers as proper respondents, see post § 131.

¶ 745. Mandamus will not lie to compel the cashier of a bank to pay the taxes assessed against its stockholders under the tax-law of 1889, the remedy provided by the act for the collection of such taxes being clear and specific.—Eyke v. Lange, 90 Mich. 592.

¶ 746. Mandamus will not lie to compel the cashier of a national bank to pay taxes assessed under the law against a stockholder upon his stock in the bank, though How. St. § 1170d2 imposes that duty; for the tax may be collected by distress or by action against the bank.—Eyke v. Lange, 104 Mich. 26.

¶ 747. Mandamus will lie in behalf of a corporation to compel its former secretary, who has resigned, to deliver up its books, records and papers, where at the time of the demand the same are in the possession of respondent at the place of hearing the suit, since a subpoena duces tecum does not afford an adequate remedy.—Coldwater Copper Min. Co. v. Gillis, 170 Mich. 126.

¶ 748. Mandamus will not lie to compel a foreign corporation to perform an act which is a prerequisite to its right to do business in this state; the proper remedy is quo warranto, or the imposition of the penalty for doing business without complying with the law.—Secretary of State v. National Salt Co., 126 Mich. 644.

¶ 749. 1897 C. C. Rule 46 providing that circuit courts shall have jurisdiction of mandamus proceedings involving the action of any private corporation, includes joint stock associations, wherefore such court has jurisdiction of a proceeding to compel an express company to carry goods.—Attorney General ex rel. Moore v. American Exp. Co., 118 Mich. 682, reversed in 177 U. S. 404, 44 L. ed. 823, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 695.

¶ 750. Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel an express company to carry goods, the company being vested with the exercise of public functions under the permissive power of the state.—Attorney General ex rel. Moore v. American Exp. Co., 118 Mich. 682, reversed in 177 U. S. 404, 44 L. ed. 823, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 695.

General duties of personal representatives and trustees, see Estates of Decedents; Guardianship; Trusts.

¶ 751. Mandamus will lie to compel an administrator to pay interest upon a judgment for costs in favor of an appellant from the probate of a will, where the estate is conceded to be solvent.—Hayden v. Hefferen, 99 Mich. 262.

¶ 752. Mandamus does not lie to compel a guardian to pay a claim against his ward which the probate court has adjudged valid; the proceeding must be by action.—Smith v. Burton, 48 Mich. 643.

V. PARTIES, PROCEDURE AND RELIEF, AND ENFORCEMENT OF WRIT.

Propriety of application to supreme court in first instance, see post § 124.

Discretion of court to grant or deny the writ, see ante § 3.

Other adequate remedy as consideration for discretion rather than element in jurisdiction, see ante ¶ 107.

Mandamus from circuit to probate court, see also Courts ¶ 181.

Statutory power of supreme court to issue writ, see Jud. Act, chap. I, § 9; Comp. L. 1915, § 12014.

Statutory powers of circuit court, see Jud. Act, chap. VI, § 1, ¶ 2; Comp. L. 1915, § 12299, ¶ 2.

Jurisdiction of circuit courts in mandamus, see 1916 C. C. Rule 50, § 1.

¶ 753. The supreme court has plenary jurisdiction in mandamus.—Tawas & B. C. R. Co. v. Iosco Circuit Judge, 44 Mich. 479; Hosier v. Higgins Township Board, 45 Mich. 340.

¶ 754. The writ cannot be issued by the circuit court except when necessary to execute the power of supervisory control over inferior tribunals, and when actually required to affect the ends of jurisdiction in cases brought under cognizance by other means.—McBride v. Grand Rapids Common Council, 32 Mich. 360.

¶ 755. The circuit court has power to issue writs of mandamus to the probate court.—

Seilnacht v. Wayne Probate Judge, 190 Mich. 461.

¶ 756. The term "inferior courts," as used in section 8 of article VI of the State Constitution, providing that circuit courts shall have power to issue mandamus to inferior courts, is used in the sense of grade and means "lower courts"; therefore mandamus will issue from the circuit court to the probate court upon good cause shown.—Mitchell v. Bay Probate Judge, 155 Mich. 550.

¶ 757. Upon a proper showing and in a proper case the circuit court may issue a writ of mandamus to a justice of the peace. —People ex rel. Dota v. McKay, How. N. P. 103.

Proper respondent in case of refusal of circuit court to issue mandamus, see post ¶ 797.

Statement of case on application to supreme court, see post § 138.

Trial of issues of fact in supreme court, see post § 153.

Supreme court practice in mandamus cases, see Sup. Ct. Rules 12, 13, 56.

¶ 758. Where it appears that a defendant in a divorce proceeding was imprisoned under a contempt order for nonpayment of temporary alimony at the time he petitioned the supreme court to issue a writ of mandamus to compel the judge to set aside such order for irregularities in the proceedings, the court will entertain the petition.—Lake v. Houghton Circuit Judge, 172 Mich. 660.

¶ 759. Where it appears that the public interests require the case to be disposed of immediately without the delay of awaiting an opportunity to apply to the circuit court, the supreme court will grant an order to show cause. (This was an application for a mandamus to compel respondent to turn over to relator the money, books, papers, and effects belonging to township treasurer's office.)—Loranger v. Navarre, 97 Mich. 615.

¶ 761. An order against a township treasurer to show cause why he should not pay an order was denied on the ground that application should have been made to the circuit court under First C. C. Law Rule 107: Jenney v. Holland, 97 Mich. 615 (note). So, where it was sought to compel a justice of the peace to issue a criminal warrant: Chamberlain v. O'Hara, 97 Mich. 615 (note). So, where the application was to compel a street railway to use a certain kind of rails: City of Detroit v. Detroit Citizens' St. R. Co., 97 Mich. 615 (note). Also to compel the chairman of a board of supervisors to sign an order: Wickham v. Kelley, 97 Mich. 615 (note). Also to compel a county treasurer to pay the prosecuting attorney's salary: Wickham v. Browne, 97 Mich. 615 (note). Also, to compel the board of supervisors to allow a bill.—Senate of Happy Homes Clubs v. Alpena County Sup'rs, 97 Mich. 615 (note).

¶ 762. An application for mandamus to compel an official stenographer of the circuit court to deliver a transcript of testimony upon the payment or tender of the statutory fees therefor must be made to the circuit court and not to the supreme court.—Lyle v. Sherman, 147 Mich. 424.

¶ 763. Since circuit courts have, under section 8 of article VI of the State Constitution, power to issue mandamus to probate courts, the supreme court will not issue mandamus to such court in the absence of an exigency.—Mitchell v. Bay Probate Judge, 155 Mich. 550.

¶ 764. The supreme court will not ordinarily review upon mandamus the action of the probate court where resort may be had to the circuit court.—Seilnacht v. Wayne Probate Judge, 190 Mich. 461.

¶ 765. The supreme court will not entertain a proceeding by mandamus to compel a probate judge to grant a petition for revival of a commission on claims, since the circuit court has power to issue such writ.—Seilnacht v. Wayne Probate Judge, 190 Mich. 461.

Judgment as essential bases for Federal mandamus, see also Courts ¶ 348.

Reviewableness of state judgment in mandamus by United States Supreme Court on Federal question involved, see Courts § 91, ¶ 339.

¶ 766. A mandamus from the state supreme court to compel an inferior state court to remove a cause to the United States circuit court upon the application of a defendant who is a citizen of another state is not the appropriate writ for that purpose; and whether it has any jurisdiction to interfere in such cases, quære.—People ex rel. Glens Falls Ins. Co. v. Jackson Circuit Judge, 21 Mich. 577.

Special interest where duty is to public, see post § 127.

Necessary and proper respondents, see post § 130.
Interventions by private persons or attorney general, see post § 132.
Amendments as to parties, see post § 134.
Right of father to apply for mandamus without appointment of guardian ad litem when infant is denied admission to school, see Guardian ad Litem ¶ 1.
Action by trustee in bankruptcy to compel payment of claim due from public constituting assets of bankrupt, see Bankruptcy § 18.

¶ 767. Respondents in mandamus proceedings are entitled to insist that they shall not be drawn into litigation by any one who cannot properly be relator, nor deprived of the responsibility of an actual proper party to the record.—People ex rel. McBride v. Kent County Sup'rs, 38 Mich. 421.

¶ 768. A private citizen cannot, in a matter where he is not directly injured, apply for a mandamus to compel the performance of an omitted duty by a public board; though cases might arise where the court would permit it, in the absence of the attorney general or prosecuting attorney, or his refusal without good cause to act.—People v. Regents of University of Michigan, 4 Mich. 98.

¶ 769. An appellee who has recovered judgment before a justice has a right to have a pretended appeal dismissed for nonperformance of the statutory condition precedent that the fees for the return be paid, and hence has a right to mandamus to compel the circuit court to vacate an order compelling a return.—People ex rel. Wiley v. Allegan Circuit Judge, 29 Mich. 487.

¶ 770. The father may be relator in an application for the writ to compel the admission of his child to the public schools.—People ex rel. Workman v. Detroit Board of Education, 18 Mich. 400.

¶ 771. The child's mother is a proper relator in a writ to compel the sheriff to imprison a person convicted under the bastardy act when necessary to compel him to contribute to the child's support.—Waite v. Washington, 44 Mich. 388.

¶ 772. A city collector being the proper custodian of a fund which he was unjustly deprived of by the county treasurer, and which was withheld by the latter, was not on mandamus to compel its payment, required to proceed in the name of the city, nor was he required to name the treasurer as such treasurer.—Webster v. Wheeler, 119 Mich. 601.

¶ 773. The fact that a warranty deed excepted taxes for a given year and subsequent years, and all claims arising therefrom, did not preclude the grantee in such deed who had purchased at a sale for certain of the years excepted in the deed, from prosecuting mandamus against the auditor general to cancel a subsequent tax deed and permit redemption, where when he purchased at such tax sale he was incorrectly informed by the officer making the sale, that there were no outstanding taxes.—Hoffman v. Auditor General, 136 Mich. 689.

¶ 774. Under the Tax Law, § 98, subd. 4 (Comp. L. 1897, § 3921), authorizing the auditor general to issue a certificate of error when a certificate that no taxes were charged against lands has been given by the proper officer within the time limited for the payment or redemption thereof, a purchaser who was incorrectly informed by the officer conducting the sale that the lands were not held for any other years, was entitled to mandamus compelling the auditor general to cancel a subsequent sale and permit a redemption by the relator.—Hoffman v. Auditor General, 136 Mich. 689.

See also ante ¶¶ 772, 796.
Attorney general or prosecuting attorneys as proper public representatives, see post § 129.

¶ 775. A private individual can apply for a writ of mandamus only in a case where he has some private or particular interest to be subserved, or some particular right to be protected by the aid of this process, independent of that which he holds in common with the public at large.—People ex rel. Russell v. State Prison Inspectors, 4 Mich. 187.

¶ 776. Whether a private individual can apply for the writ to restrain the agent of the state prison from teaching the trade of or the manufacture of the articles made by the relator, quære.—People ex rel. Russell v. State Prison Inspectors, 4 Mich. 187.

¶ 777. A private citizen does not possess the right, without permission of the court, to apply for a writ of mandamus to compel a public board to perform an omitted duty.—Sterling v. Regents of University, 110 Mich. 369.

¶ 778. Mandamus will not lie to compel the performance of public duties by public officers except where a specific right is involved not possessed by citizens generally.—Wilson v. Cleveland, 157 Mich. 510.

¶ 779. The fact that the mayor of a village was its chief executive officer, and required to preside at council meetings, and cast the deciding vote in cases of equal division, and to exercise supervision over the affairs of the village, did not vest him with any specific right, distinguished from the rights of citizens generally, which would entitle him to mandamus to compel attendance of members of the council at meetings.—Wilson v. Cleveland, 157 Mich. 510.

¶ 781. A county officer removed his office to a place to which he claimed the county seat had been removed by action of the supervisors and electors; application being made by a private individual for a mandamus to compel him to return to the former county seat, and there being no showing that the proper public officer, on being requested, had refused to make any application himself, or that the relator had any special interest in the matter not common to citizens generally, it was refused. If mandamus can be resorted to for such a purpose, the proper public officer to apply for it in the supreme court is the attorney general.—People ex rel. Delbridge v. Green, 29 Mich. 121.

¶ 782. The rule rejecting the intervention of private complainants against public grievances is one of discretion and not of law, and a private person who would be a competent bidder under a state law for letting a contract may appear as relator by his own counsel in a proceeding by mandamus to compel state officers to carry out the law, if the public interest requires prompt action and the attorney general declines to appear for him.—People ex rel. Ayres v. State Board of Auditors, 42 Mich. 422.

¶ 783. On the refusal of the proper officer to file a chattel mortgage, and of a justice of the peace to issue an execution, the mortgagee and judgment creditor have such a special interest as entitles them to apply for mandamus to compel such action on the part of said officers.—Pistorius v. Stempel, 81 Mich. 133.

¶ 784. Private individuals have such an interest as will support mandamus to compel the building of a bridge where the river divides their respective farms and where the schoolhouse is on the opposite side of the river.—Brophy v. Schindler, 126 Mich. 341.

¶ 785. Resident free-holders are the proper parties to institute proceedings to compel a commissioner of highways to erect a bridge. The duty sought to be enforced is not one due to the government as such.—Berube v. Wheeler, 128 Mich. 32.

¶ 786. A mandamus determining the constitutionality of a statute consolidating two cities will not be granted on the application of a private citizen who has no interest other than as a resident and tax-payer.—Smith v. Mayor, etc., of City of Saginaw, 81 Mich. 123.

¶ 787. A proceeding on the relation of a private citizen to compel the secretary of state to give notice under a prior law apportioning senatorial districts is properly sustained where the attorney general, by appearing for the respondent, shows that he would not have instituted such proceeding if requested.—Giddings v. Secretary of State, 93 Mich. 1.

¶ 788. The signer of a local option petition, who is a qualified voter, has a sufficient special interest in the matter to entitle him to bring mandamus to compel the board of supervisors to submit the question to the voters, the petition being sufficient.—Flanders v. Board Sup'rs Van Buren Co., 160 Mich. 27.

¶ 789. Electors of the state who are interested in the proper administration of the law have such an interest as entitles them to appear as relators in mandamus proceedings to compel the secretary of state to recanvass a petition filed by him under the referendum clause of the Constitution, art. V, § 1, as amended in 1913.—Thompson v. Secretary of State, 192 Mich. 512.

¶ 790. It is a matter of discretion for the court, and not of law, as to whether relators have such interest as entitles them to institute mandamus proceedings.—Thompson v. Secretary of State, 192 Mich. 512.

¶ 791. Individual electors, in the discretion of the court, may appear as relators in an action of mandamus to compel a board of supervisors to reconvene and recanvass votes cast at a local option election.—Baldwin v. Board Sup'rs of Alger County, 189 Mich. 372.

¶ 792. The court properly exercised its discretion in allowing individual electors to appear as relators in an action of mandamus to compel a board of supervisors to reconvene and recanvass votes cast at a local option election where the electors were almost equally divided on the question in issue at the election, and the attorney general refused to act or permit his name to be used, although the county prosecuting attorney had not been asked to act, and officially held no views adverse to the proceeding.—Baldwin v. Board Sup'rs of Alger County, 189 Mich. 372.

Board of education as relator, see also ante ¶ 584.

Municipality as relator against another municipality, see also ante ¶ 622.

Amendment to name county as relator instead of supervisors, see post ¶ 812.

¶ 793. The board of water commissioners of East Saginaw is a proper relator to an application to compel the common council to levy a tax to pay bonds issued by the board and about to mature.—People ex rel. Board of Water Com'rs v. East Saginaw Common Council, 33 Mich. 164.

Intervention by attorney general, see post § 132.

Attorney general as law officer to represent state officers, see Attorneys § 61.

Representation of state officials in mandamus, see Attorneys § 61.

¶ 794. The attorney general is not a proper relator in proceedings by mandamus to compel a justice of the peace to entertain a complaint where the offense charged is against individual interests and does not affect the public welfare.—Attorney General v. Detroit Police Justice, 41 Mich. 224.

¶ 795. The prosecuting attorney is authorized to bring mandamus proceedings to compel a village council to vacate proceedings whereby liquor bonds were approved notwithstanding a protest filed by a majority of the electors of the village under Public Acts 1907, No. 321.—Covell v. Common Council of Village of Fife Lake, 179 Mich. 151.

¶ 796. A mandamus proceeding by private parties to compel a city and its officers to refrain from submitting amendments to a city charter, under Local Acts 1899, No. 452, will not be dismissed on the ground that the remedy is improper, and that there is no intervention of the attorney general, where it is apparent that an injunction would have been granted, if requested by the petitioners as taxpayers interested in the expenditure of public moneys, the intervention of the attorney general not being essential as it is in cases of a purely public nature, and such intervention being obtainable if demanded, and where the time intervening before the election is short so that the court should review the questions presented.—Elliott v. City of Detroit, 121 Mich. 611.

Successors and transferees as proper respondents, see post § 131.

Amenability of aggregate body to mandamus, see ante § 71.

Intervention, see post § 132.

Parties respondent to mandamus to enforce payment of municipal or public bonds, see Municipal Bonds, VI.

¶ 797. Where a circuit judge illegally refuses to hear application for mandamus, the relator should apply to the supreme court for an order to compel him to do so; application to the supreme court for an order to the original respondent to show cause will be denied.—Backus v. Carleton, 97 Mich. 624.

¶ 798. Mandamus to compel the board of public works of Detroit to vacate its approval of a plat was denied where neither of the makers of the plat nor the purchasers of the lots designated upon it were before the court.—Campau v. Board of Public Works of Detroit, 86 Mich. 372.

¶ 799. Where the incorporators of a mutual insurance company, pursuant to authority lodged in them, by the act under which the company is organized, to fix the number of directors and the manner of electing them, have vested the power to call the stockholders together for election purposes exclusively in the board of directors, the president and secretary of the company are not the proper respondents in mandamus proceedings to compel the reconvening of the stockholders for an election in compliance with the stockholders' minority law, after an election in which the rights of the minority under such law have been disregarded.—Dusenbury v. Looker, 110 Mich. 58.

¶ 800. Under a statute which requires such commissioner to submit a proposed expenditure for the construction of a bridge and to obtain the approval of a township board, where the commissioner of highways has done so, and the board has refused its approval, the township board is a necessary party in a mandamus proceeding to compel the erection of the bridge.—Berube v. Wheeler, 128 Mich. 32.

¶ 801. The clerk of the Detroit recorder's court was properly impleaded with the judge of such court, in mandamus to compel the delivery to the sheriff of Wayne County of a venire facias to summon jurors for said court; where he acted under the direction of such judge in refusing to make delivery to the sheriff.—Dickson v. Judge of Recorder's Court of Detroit, 136 Mich. 479.

¶ 802. In a mandamus suit by a subordinate lodge against the grand lodge, for wrongfully revoking a charter, it is proper to include as defendants all officers whose duty it was to recognize the rights of relator.—Golden Star Lodge No. 1 v. Watterson, 158 Mich. 696.

¶ 803. Mandamus to settle a case for review will not issue to a judge who has resigned since filing his answer to the order to show cause. Relief should be asked from his successor.—De Haas v. Newaygo Circuit Judge, 46 Mich. 12.

¶ 804. The directors, in office and whose right to office is attacked, are the necessary persons to be made defendants to mandamus to compel calling of a legal election.—Dusenbury v. Looker, 110 Mich. 58.

¶ 805. Mandamus will not lie against a street railway company which has sold its railroad, franchise rights and property to another company which has taken possession, to compel it to comply with the conditions of its franchise.—Township of Grosse Pointe v. Detroit & L. St. C. Ry., 130 Mich. 368.

See also ante ¶ 796.

¶ 806. A prosecuting attorney instituted a bill to enjoin a village from accepting saloon bonds. The village and others brought mandamus against the circuit judge to compel him to vacate an order refusing to dissolve a temporary injunction. The attorney general intervened as a respondent. Held, that, as the issuance of the writ of mandamus was discretionary, no substantial objection could be urged against the appearance of the prosecuting attorney as a respondent.—Village of Wolverine v. Cheboygan Circuit Judge, 162 Mich. 713.

¶ 807. A petition for writ of mandamus to compel the cancellation by a township board of a liquor license granted by it, is sufficient, although the name of a private individual and not that of the prosecuting attorney appears as relator, where the latter signs the petition in his official capacity and represents the relator both in the lower and in the supreme court.—Osborne v. Township Board of Richland, 183 Mich. 220.

Pendency of motion for same relief as bar to mandamus, see ante ¶ 139.

Abatement of actions in general, see Abatement.

Effect of expiration of office to abate action, see also Abatement § 5.

¶ 808. A mandamus directing the action of a judicial tribunal is to be regarded as directed to the judge officially, and as binding the incumbent, whoever he may be, and not merely the judge who denied the application and has since ceased to hold the office.—People ex rel. Barrett v. Bacon, 18 Mich. 247.

¶ 809. Mandamus proceedings against an officer, merely as an official, are not affected by a change of incumbency.—People ex rel. Reeder v. Wexford County Treasurer, 37 Mich. 351.

¶ 810. Proceedings in mandamus do not abate by expiration of defendant's office, where there is a continuing duty irrespective of the incumbent, and the proceeding is undertaken to enforce an obligation of the corporation or municipality to which the corporation is attached.—Thompson v. United States ex rel. Cambria Iron Co., 108 U. S. 490, 26 L. ed. 521.

¶ 811. It seems that evidence is admissible to show that an attempted resignation of an officer who is a defendant in mandamus proceedings was simulated and fraudulent.—Thompson v. United States ex rel. Cambria Iron Co., 108 U. S. 490, 26 L. ed. 521.

Additions and changes to meet possible transfers pendente lite, see also post ¶ 861.

Retaining cause to bring in further parties, see post ¶ 871.

General law of amendments of parties, see Parties.

Amendments of the petition or answer, see post § 149.

¶ 812. Where mandamus to compel the county treasurer to deposit county funds in the depository designated by the board of supervisors under the provisions of Act No. 461, Local Acts 1907, is brought in the name of the board of supervisors instead of the county, the objection can be cured by amendment.—Board Sup'rs Gratiot Co. v. Munson, 157 Mich. 505.

Delay and laches as bar, see ante § 12.

Allegations as to demand and refusal to perform duty, see post § 136.

Sufficiency of prayer of petition, see post § 137.

Statement of facts accompanying petition to supreme court, see post § 138.

Replications and further pleadings, see post § 148.

Burden of proof and presumptions as to matters alleged, see post § 163.

Implications or presumptions from facts averred, see post § 163.

Taking petition as true for want of traverse in answer, see post § 164.

Right of opposing party to be heard on application, see post § 150.

Dismissal for defects of petition or application, see post § 146.

Denial of writ without prejudice or with leave to renew application, see post § 173.

Applicability of statute of limitations to mandamus actions, see Limitations § 19.

Retention of ill chosen prohibition application as application for mandamus, see Prohibition, Writ of.

Supreme court clerk's fees on docketing mandamus, see Sup. Ct. Rule 2.

Fee payable to clerk of circuit court on filing of application for writ, see Jud. Act, chap. XLVI, § 2; Comp. L. 1915, § 13670.

¶ 813. Where one seeks by mandamus to compel a public officer to perform a duty prescribed by statute, he must show by his application that all the conditions necessary to create the duty exist. It is not sufficient to show facts from which their existence may be inferred.—People ex rel. Colby v. Woodhull Township Board, 14 Mich. 28; People ex rel. Monroe v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 19 Mich. 296.

¶ 814. Mandamus to set aside an order of the circuit court quashing an information will not be granted where it is not made to appear in the petition that any different result would be reached if the order were set aside.—Clute v. Ionia Circuit Judge, 139 Mich. 337.

¶ 815. A relator or respondent who relies on official records to establish his right must produce such records or certified copies thereof with his petition or answer; it is not enough to refer to the originals.—Cronin v. Kalkaska County Sup'rs, 58 Mich. 448.

¶ 816. A petition in mandamus to compel the building of a bridge on a township line directed against the two townships is not indefinite because it alleges a duty in the alternative on one township or on the other or on both.—Brophy v. Schindler, 126 Mich. 341.

¶ 817. Where a child was refused admission to the public schools on account of his color, it will be no answer to his application for this writ that he does not show himself otherwise entitled.—People ex rel. Workman v. Detroit Board of Education, 18 Mich. 400.

¶ 818. Mandamus will not lie to compel the trial court to grant a motion for a new trial in a criminal case, where the petition fails to show that any evidence was produced in favor of the motion.—O'Brien v. Chambers, 97 Mich. 607.

¶ 819. Mandamus will not issue to compel the clerk of the court to permit one employed in making abstracts of title to examine and copy a file in an action relating to land between private parties, upon a petition which negatives constructive notice of the pendency of the action, and does not assert actual notice, or state that the examination and copying of the file is pertinent to the title under investigation or necessary to the interests of his employer, although it does state that it is "necessary to the completion of the relator's work."—Burton v. Reynolds, 110 Mich. 354.

¶ 820. A petition for mandamus by the state board of tax commissioners to compel a city board of assessors to turn over assessment rolls of the city to the petitioner to enable it to use the same need not affirmatively allege that an order requiring the turning over to the petitioner of such rolls was based on an inspection of such rolls.—Board of State Tax Com'rs v. Kohler, 193 Mich. 420.

¶ 821. On certiorari to review the action of a circuit judge in denying a petition for writ of mandamus requiring a board of supervisors to reconvene and rescind their action in passing a resolution for the submission of the local option question to the voters, the petition for mandamus held to state sufficient facts so as to require the allowance of an order to show cause why the writ of mandamus should not issue.—Anker v. Board Sup'rs of Iosco County, 190 Mich. 610.

¶ 821a. Where a petition for a mandamus to compel the sale of public land alleges that, when the relator applied to purchase it, the commissioner of the state land-office assigned, as his reason for refusing to sell, the existence of a former deed which turned out to be void, this is not equivalent to an allegation that but for the deed the lot was subject to sale, or that when the deed was executed it was subject to sale at an appraisal made before that; the commissioner's omission to assign any other reason is only circumstantial evidence.—People ex rel. Chapman v. State Land Office Com'r, 26 M. 146.

¶ 822. The petition for the order to show cause, in mandamus proceedings to compel a municipal council to approve a liquor seller's bond, must make it appear what was the reason, if any, given by the respondent for refusing, and the circumstances of the refusal; otherwise the reason must be presumed sufficient and the order may be refused.—Goss v. Common Council of Vermontville, 44 Mich. 319.

¶ 823. Peremptory mandamus to compel the common council of a city to issue a liquor license is properly denied where the petition does not set up the number of licenses permitted by Act 291, P. A. 1909, How. 2nd Ed. § 5055, as amended, or that the maximum number which might be granted thereunder were not granted and does not allege a vacancy in the maximum number of licenses which may be granted under such act.—Wojnowski v. Common Council of City of Detroit, 176 Mich. 349.

¶ 824. An application made by one justice of the peace in behalf of another justice to compel a township board to admit such justice to a seat must be denied where no authority for making the application is shown.—Grondin v. Logan, 88 Mich. 247.

¶ 825. On an order to show cause why mandamus should not issue to a board of supervisors to reconvene and recanvass a vote their answer acting as board of canvassers averring that they had not refused but had adjourned to await a further return by a township board and praying mandamus against it, was treated as a petition, and an order to show cause why true returns were not made was issued against inspectors of election.—Double v. McQueen, 96 Mich. 39.

See also ante ¶ 426.

¶ 826. A petition for mandamus must show a clear legal duty resting upon the persons or tribunal against whom the remedy is sought, which they refuse, on request, to perform; and it does not show this if the request embraces anything which it would be illegal for them to do.—People ex rel. Butler v. Saginaw County Sup'rs, 26 Mich. 22.

¶ 827. Where a corporator demanded of the secretary of the corporation an inspection of its books, records and papers, and the demand was not shown to have been made at the office of the corporation, and no excuse was given for not making it there, and the only ground stated for the application was that the corporator had a desire "to ascertain the rights, duties, privileges and liabilities, and for the protection" of the corporator, the writ was refused.—People ex rel. Bishop v. Walker, 9 Mich. 328.

¶ 828. Where mandamus is sought to compel a municipal council to approve a liquor-seller's bond, the petition for the order to show cause should show respondent's reason for refusing, if any was given, and the circumstances of refusal; otherwise the reason must be presumed sufficient and the order may be refused.—Goss v. Vermontville, 44 Mich. 319; Negley v. Sturgis, 44 Mich. 1.

¶ 829. Mandamus will not lie to vacate an order setting aside a judgment where the petition fails to show that an application has been made to the circuit judge to set aside such order.—Hitchcock v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 97 Mich. 614.

¶ 830. For the reason that the petition showed no application to the court below for proper action an order to show cause was denied where it was sought to compel a circuit judge to vacate an order substituting attorneys in a pending case.—Galloway v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 97 Mich. 614 (note).

Judgment and peremptory writ, see post § 171 et seq.

¶ 831. An objection that the prayer of a petition for mandamus to compel a village, incorporated under the general village incorporation act, to levy a tax sufficient to pay the amount due on a contract to furnish a water supply for the prevention of fires, is not sufficiently definite, in that it is not ascertainable from said prayer whether a special or a general assessment is asked for, is untenable, as the court can and will direct as to the nature of the assessment, if a mandamus is granted.—East Jordan Lumber Co. v. Village of East Jordan, 100 Mich. 201.

Dismissal for defective showing, see post § 146.

Objections and waiver of same by omission from brief and argument, see post § 145.

Matters in statement not presented below, see post § 156.

¶ 832. Order to show cause denied without prejudice for failure to furnish a brief statement of the case as required by Supreme Court Rule 58.—Loree v. Lenawee Circuit Judge, 97 Mich. 614 (note); People's Mut. Ben. Soc. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 97 Mich. 614 (note).

Nature and terms of the order to show cause, see post § 140.

Propriety of granting peremptory writ, see post § 171 et seq.

¶ 833. An order to show cause why a peremptory mandamus should not issue has, in the supreme court, been uniformly substituted for an alternative mandamus.—People ex rel. Anderson v. La Grange Township Board, 2 Mich. 187; Township of Roscommon v. Midland County Sup'rs, 49 Mich. 454.

¶ 834. The writ of mandamus is meant to be a speedy and summary remedy, whose chief value would be destroyed by the delays and complications of special pleadings, authorized under the practice of alternative or double writs.—Township of Roscommon v. Midland Board Sup'rs, 49 Mich. 454.

¶ 835. Where a petition for a writ of mandamus, upon its face, fails to state facts entitling the petitioner to the writ, an order to show cause may properly be denied.—Anker v. Board Sup'rs of Iosco County, 190 Mich. 610.

¶ 836. The allowance of an order to show cause, upon the filing of a petition asking for a mandamus, is a matter of judicial discretion, and not a matter of right.—Anker v. Board Sup'rs of Iosco County, 190 Mich. 610.

Peremptory writ, see post §§ 171-175.

Proper mode of pleading to the order to show cause, see post § 142.

Propriety of mandamus as remedy as an issue to be tried on hearing of the return, see post ¶ 884.
Amendments of petition or answer, see post § 149.

Power of judge in vacation to make order to show cause, see 1916 C. C. Rule 50, § 2.
When writ is to be made returnable, see 1916 C. C. Rule 50, § 1.

¶ 837. An order to show cause why mandamus should not issue to compel a circuit judge to set aside a verdict does not necessarily imply personal censure of the respondent; since the review of judicial action is confined to legal errors, and the action itself is presumably conscientious.—Churchill v. Alpena Circuit Judge, 56 Mich. 536.

¶ 838. The entry of an order on the respondent in mandamus to show cause, is not a ruling that mandamus was the proper remedy.—Reed v. St. Clair Circuit Judge, 122 Mich. 153.

¶ 839. On a motion for a peremptory mandamus the court will not allow the relator to amend his order on the respondent to show cause, where it is too broad and asks more than he is entitled to, so as to include that only to which he is entitled.—People ex rel. Anderson v. La Grange Township Board, 2 Mich. 187.

§ 141. Service or appearance to writ.

General law of service of process and appearance, see Process, II; Appearance.

¶ 840. The plea of nonservice of the writ is inadmissible where the defendant appears and makes return.—Edwards v. United States, 103 U. S. 471, 26 L. ed. 314.

Objections to petition or return and waiver of objections, see post § 145.
Motion to strike, see post § 145.
Replication or further pleadings, see post § 148.
Responsive affidavits, see also post § 168.
Demurrer as admission of facts in petition, see post § 165.
Answering or making return as an appearance to the writ, see ante ¶ 840.

¶ 841. The better practice is to answer a petition for mandamus, and not to demur to it.—Schouwink v. Ferguson, 191 Mich. 284.

¶ 842. Quære, whether under 1897 C. C. Rule 46, regulating procedure on mandamus, requiring an answer and that it shall be taken as admitting allegations not answered, and providing that the cause shall stand for hearing on the return day without notice, any demurrer or dilatory pleading is permissible.—Lauzon v. Board of Supervisors of Chippewa County, 129 Mich. 269.

¶ 843. An alternative mandamus is answered by a return, which is in the nature and performs the office of a plea; while the order to show cause is answered by affidavit.—People ex rel. Anderson v. La Grange Township Board, 2 Mich. 187.

Answer, demurrer, or affidavit as proper mode of response to petition or order to show cause, see ante § 142.
Alleging matters of defense or justification of respondent, see post § 144.

Requisites of answer in supreme court and printing of record, see Sup. Ct. Rules 13, 56.
Power of courts or judges to enlarge time for return and pleadings thereto, see Jud. Act, chap. XXXVI, § 7; Comp. L. 1915, § 13443.

¶ 844. If the return states that the respondent has no knowledge concerning a fact necessary to the relator's case, it will be sufficient to put such fact in issue.—People ex rel. Portage School Dist. No. 1 v. Ryan, 17 Mich. 159.

¶ 845. Record issues should be set forth as they stand, in showing cause in cases involving a settlement of public accounts between townships and counties.—Township of Higgins v. Midland County Sup'rs, 52 Mich. 16.

¶ 846. Upon mandamus to compel a circuit judge to settle the testimony in a chancery case and to approve an appeal bond, the printed record filed by relator is sufficient if it contains all that is necessary to present the points raised.—Haney v. Allegan Circuit Judge, 167 Mich. 489.

¶ 847. An answer to an order to show cause is disregarded if only drafted by the attorneys in the case without being submitted to the respondent and approved by him. But the case may be treated as on demurrer to the relator's showing.—Douglass v. Manistee Circuit Judge, 42 Mich. 495.

¶ 848. In mandamus proceedings the answer should be signed by respondents or some one duly authorized in their behalf and not merely by their attorney.—DeFoe v. Board Election Com'rs Bay City, 174 Mich. 472.

Sufficiency of showing on the record to justify or excuse, see post § 162.
Denial of writ on offer to perform, see post § 175.

¶ 849. An order to show cause why a township should not pay a town order is fully met by a return showing that it was fraudulently issued without consideration and without any allowance by the proper authorities.—Noble v. Township of Paris, 56 Mich. 219.

¶ 850. A person who claimed to be the holder and owner of certain ditch orders asked for a mandamus to compel the board of supervisors to provide for their payment. The board answered that they had no knowledge as to whether the relator was holder and owner of the orders as claimed. Held, that the answer was proper.—Brownell v. Gratiot County Sup'rs, 49 Mich. 414.

¶ 851. Respondents should set forth in their return to an order to show cause the facts relied upon in justification of the nonaction complained of, and not in individual affidavits appended to return, which are properly no part thereof.—Potter v. Common Council of Village of Homer, 59 Mich. 8.

¶ 852. An answer of the common council acting as a convassing board to mandamus to compel a recount of votes cast at a mayoralty election is insufficient to show cause against recount, where it does not show that the ballot boxes in one ward had not been sealed and kept in a condition to recount, and shows doubt as to another, and as to others no mention is made at all of the ballot boxes and ballots.—Ward v. Culver, 144 Mich. 57.

Practice on evasion of writ or order to show cause, see post § 147.
Amendments of pleadings, see post § 149.

¶ 853. Objections stated in the petition for mandamus, but not noticed in relator's brief, are considered waived.—Feek v. Township Board of Bloomingdale, 82 Mich. 398.

¶ 854. Where on a petition for mandamus to compel a circuit judge to vacate an order denying a motion to extend the time for settling a bill of exceptions, a question as to the sufficiency of the notice of settlement of respondent's return is raised, but counsel for relator files a reply brief and enters no motion to dismiss the proceedings, the return will be treated as properly before this court.—Carrier v. Emmet Circuit Judge, 155 Mich. 344.

¶ 855. Upon mandamus to compel the respondent to settle the testimony in a chancery case and to approve an appeal bond, respondent moved before the supreme court to strike the printed record from the files on the ground that it was insufficient to inform the court of the facts involved. It appeared that in said record certain paragraphs were omitted from the exhibits attached to respondent's answer, and also parts of said answer, and that the omitted matter tended to show improper conduct on the part of relator's counsel. The record as printed, however, was sufficient to present the questions raised in the mandamus proceeding. Held, respondent's motion should be denied.—Haney v. Allegan Circuit Judge, 167 Mich. 489.

¶ 856. The court will not strike from the answer in mandamus against a circuit judge all matter not shown to be within the personal knowledge of the respondent or based on the records and files in the case; the better practice is to bring to the attention of the court on the hearing all matters not entitled to consideration.—Erikson v. Alpena Circuit Judge, 138 Mich. 108.

¶ 857. Where in mandamus to compel respondent judge to settle a case on appeal and to approve relator's bond the relator fails to comply with Rule 56 (154 Mich. xxx) by omitting material portions of respondent's return in making up the printed record, a motion to dismiss the petition for mandamus will lie.—Haney v. Allegan Circuit Judge, 164 Mich. 581.

General law of contempt, see Contempt.
Provision that omission to answer shall be a contempt, see Jud. Act, chap. XXXVI, § 1; Comp. L. 1915, § 13437.
Supreme court practice on failure to answer order, see Sup. Ct. Rule 13.

¶ 858. Evasion of an order to show cause, where no alternative order is granted, is not, upon the return thereto, open to any further redress than the issue of a peremptory writ, with costs.—Potter v. Homer Common Council, 59 Mich. 8.

¶ 859. The fine provided by Comp. L. 1871, § 7110, How. St. § 8669, for not obeying a mandamus cannot be imposed for failure merely to make return to an order to show cause.—People ex rel. Fletcher v. Kalamazoo Circuit Judge, 39 Mich. 301.

See also ante ¶ 875.

Plea to answer to traverse same under Judicature Act, see post ¶¶ 957-959.

Declination to consider unnecessary pleadings, see post ¶ 887.

Provision for plea to return, see Jud. Act, chap. XXXVI, § 4; Comp. L. 1915, § 13440.

¶ 860. A replication in a mandamus proceeding filed on relator's own motion without any suggestion of the necessity of framing an issue or any order of the court, may be stricken from the files, since C. C. Rule 46c, which provides that "all material allegations of the petition in mandamus proceedings not specifically answered by the respondent, may be taken as admitted by the respondent as true as alleged," and subd. d providing that the proceeding "shall stand for hearing upon the return day of the writ without notice of trial or hearing, unless the court for cause shown shall order a postponement of such hearing," do not contemplate the filing of a replication as a matter of right.—Wagner v. Gladwin Circuit Judge, 131 Mich. 129.

Amendments as to parties, see ante § 134.

Amendment of order to show cause, see also ante ¶ 839.

General law of amendments to pleadings at law, see Pleading, VI.

Provisions for amendments to proposed return by respondent judge, see Jud. Act, chap. XXXVI, § 1; Comp. L. 1915, § 13437.

¶ 861. Although the petition for mandamus gave property owners their day in court, and the order of the supreme court, overruling the order of the superior court, is conclusive and binding upon them as to all questions raised by their answers; inasmuch as it is possible that, since the original petition was filed, other parties may have acquired interests in the premises by transfer, mortgage, or otherwise, the relator should be allowed to amend said petition by making such persons, if any there are, parties.—City of Grand Rapids v. Burlingame (Judge Superior Court, Grand Rapids), 102 Mich. 321.

¶ 862. The refusal of an order to show cause does not operate as a final disposition of an application for a writ of mandamus, but such application may be amended, if that is warranted by the facts, or a new one may be filed.—Anker v. Board Sup'rs of Iosco County, 190 Mich. 610.

¶ 863. An "amended petition" for the writ of mandamus will not be considered by the supreme court, where respondent has never answered, and has never been called upon to answer it.—McMeekin v. Saginaw Probate Judge, 150 Mich. 354.

¶ 864. Where on mandamus to review the refusal to set aside a sale of realty under execution, the record showed that the execution was not delivered to the sheriff until a day after the levy, the relator was permitted to correct the return, if the error was one of fact; as the point had neither been argued nor passed upon below.—Flynn v. Kalamazoo Circuit Judge, 136 Mich. 23.

¶ 865. Where relator in a petition for mandamus files an amended petition, and asks in his brief "that if necessary a further return be ordered to this amended petition," his request will be refused, for this court will not decide any case piecemeal, especially a mandamus case, where the proceeding should be expeditious.—McMeekin v. Saginaw Probate Judge, 150 Mich. 354.

¶ 866. A fact which has arisen since the return was made—e. g., the appointment of a successor to the respondent officer, whose return stated that he had resigned—cannot avail as matter of defense unless set up by a plea puis darrein continuance or its equivalent.—Thompson v. United States ex rel. Cambria Iron Co., 103 U. S. 480, 26 L. ed. 521.

Calendaring and noticing causes in general, see Calendar.

Calendaring and setting causes in supreme court, see Appeal § 134.

When cause shall stand for hearing, see 1916 C. C. Rule 50, § 4.

¶ 867. Where cause has been shown in opposition to an application for a mandamus, and an argument is not had until a subsequent term, the case must be noticed and placed upon the docket for argument as a calendar case, and printed briefs furnished.—People ex rel. Plugger v. Fillmore Township Board, 11 Mich. 197; People ex rel. Detroit & H. R. Co. v. Salem Township Board, 19 Mich. 11.

¶ 868. It was left an open question whether C. C. Rule 19(b) requiring four days' notice of argument and a copy of the motion or petition and affidavits to be served applies in mandamus cases.—Webster v. Wheeler, 119 Mich. 601.

¶ 869. An objection that the four days' notice required by C. C. Rule 19(b) in mandamus was not given came too late after the denial of a motion to dismiss, and after respondent had answered and the case had gone to a hearing.—Webster v. Wheeler, 119 Mich. 601.

¶ 870. In a mandamus proceeding against commissioner of highways of a township to compel the erection of a bridge the case was at issue upon the filing of an answer to the petition, and was not a calendar case requiring 14 days' notice of trial.—Berube v. Wheeler, 128 Mich. 32.

¶ 871. Where a party had been ordered to show cause in a proceeding to compel the issue of patents to certain lands, but there was no proof of the service of the order and no reason given why it was not served, the court, in order not to prejudice any of his rights before he had an opportunity to be heard, permitted the case to be retained for further proceedings as to parties not yet notified so that they might be brought in, if the relator desired.—People ex rel. County of Houghton v. State Land Office Com'r, 23 Mich. 270.

¶ 872. In mandamus cases the party interested is permitted to be heard in resisting the application.—Beecher v. Anderson, 45 Mich. 543.

¶ 873. On the hearing of an application for a mandamus, the party showing cause is entitled to open and close the argument.—People ex rel. Detroit Board of Education v. Wayne County Treasurer, 8 Mich. 392.

¶ 874. Where, in mandamus causes, the relator formally demurs to the respondent's answer, the former has the affirmative and is entitled to open and close the argument on the hearing.—People ex rel. Harrington v. Wands, 23 Mich. 385.

Proper county in which to try issues of fact, see Jud. Act, chap. XXXVI, § 4; Comp. L. 1915, § 13440.

¶ 875. On petition for mandamus to compel the payment of highway orders the parties should frame their issues on the answer, if it denies the validity of the orders; it is immaterial to reply that in a certain suit the judge had made a finding sustaining the orders, and to rejoin that a full finding was not requested, and make surrejoinder that it was, and similiter.—Just v. Township of Wise, 47 Mich. 511.

¶ 876. If by its return a board of registration denies relator's right to be registered as a voter, an issue will be directed to determine the fact.—People ex rel. Dean v. Nankin Board of Registration, 15 Mich. 156.

¶ 877. The relator is not entitled to have an issue framed as to the good faith of the township board in rejecting a drug bond where the return in mandamus states facts which show that the board acted within its discretionary power and in good faith.—Bailey v. Van Buren Circuit Judge, 128 Mich. 627.

¶ 878. On mandamus to compel the secretary of state to set aside his order submitting Pub. Acts 1915, No. 324, to a vote of the electors under the Constitution, art. V, § 1, as amended in 1913, and to recount and recanvass the petitions because of irregularity therein, held that a motion to frame issues should be granted unless the facts were settled by agreement, as the action of the respondent should be confined to the petitions as presented, and the issues so framed should be tried in the supreme court.—Thompson v. Secretary of State, 191 Mich. 303.

Trial of facts in supreme court, when proper, see also ante ¶ 878.

¶ 879. Comp. L. 1871, chap. 226, How. St., chap. 299, provides that in mandamus proceedings there may be a trial of certain issues of fact in the county where the facts arose, in the same way as in an action on the case for false return. Held, that this relates to cases where a writ of mandamus has been first issued and a return made under which issues of fact or law are framed—a practice which is not customary here.—Township of Roscommon v. Midland Board Sup'rs, 49 Mich. 454.

¶ 880. Such issues of fact as are introduced by or under the return are disposed of specifically, not by sending down the entire case on the record, but in the same way as are particular issues sent down in chancery cases to be passed on.—Township of Roscommon v. Midland Board Sup'rs, 49 Mich. 454.

¶ 881. Where a mandamus was petitioned for to compel payment upon certain orders issued upon estimates made under a grading contract, and the supreme court did not regard the estimates as final, it directed the framing of an issue to be tried by jury below to determine the exact amount of work done under the contract, the whole amount of orders issued under it, and the difference, if any, between the sum earned and that included in the orders.—People ex rel. Whitly v. Lansing Common Council, 27 Mich. 131.

¶ 882. Whether the statute concerning the submission of special questions to the jury applies to cases where the issue of fact is made up in the supreme court, and specific questions are sent down to the circuit to be determined by the jury, quære. The circuit judge cannot restrict the scope of the inquiry ordered, and it is not certain that he can enlarge it.—Miner v. Vedder, 66 Mich. 101.

¶ 883. Where the petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the payment of an account, and the answer thereon, presented issues involving the investigation of long accounts between a township and county, the matter was remanded to the circuit court for a statement of account; and it was suggested that the case might properly be referred by the circuit court to a referee under How. St. § 7878.—Haines v. Saginaw County Sup'rs, 87 Mich. 287.

Restriction to matters presented by the return or record, see post § 155.
Questions not presented to or considered by respondent, see post § 156.
Questions affecting strangers, see post § 157.
Questions antecedent or collateral to the duty alleged, see post § 158.

Provision for hearing on petition and return in absence of plea to return, see Jud. Act, chap. XXXVI, § 4; Comp. L. 1915, § 13440.

¶ 884. Whether a mandamus is the proper remedy in a case is not determined by an order to show cause why the writ should not issue. That point may be finally examined and determined at the hearing on the return of the writ, when both parties can be heard. —Olson v. Muskegon Circuit Judge, 49 Mich. 85.

¶ 885. On an application for mandamus to compel the raising of a tax to pay warrants purporting to be issued by a board of supervisors, the question of the validity of the proceedings to organize the county was not determined where it was not essential to the decision of the case.—People ex rel. Pack v. Presque Isle Sup'rs, 36 Mich. 377.

¶ 886. In mandamus to compel a circuit judge to enter an order in accordance with the prayer in an intervening petition for the removal of a receiver, the subsequent change of condition and passing of the opportunity for receiver's misconduct renders the determination of a question whether he should be restrained an unnecessary one.—Moran v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 125 Mich. 6.

¶ 887. Under Sup. Ct. Rule 13, and 1897 C. C. Rule 46c, neither replication nor rejoinder are authorized in mandamus proceedings, though a replication may be permitted, and hence a rejoinder in such case need not be examined for the purpose of finding issues not made by the petition and answer.—Lewis v. Board of Education of City of Detroit, 139 Mich. 306.

¶ 888. In mandamus to compel a circuit court judge to set aside an order quashing a writ of capias ad respondendum where the return does not deny and thereby admits the allegation that the judge limited his decision to the ground specified, other grounds for quashing the writ will not be considered under the Supreme Court Rule No. 13.—Clark v. Kent Circuit Judge, 125 Mich. 449.

¶ 889. In mandamus to compel the Railroad Crossing Board to approve relator's map of its railroad, the reasons for the refusal to approve the map assigned by respondents on the hearing were not considered; but the issuance of a writ was ordered directing the board to proceed to approve or disapprove the map as required by statute (How. St. § 3321) and to set forth its reasons for its action.—Wisconsin, M. & N. Ry. Co. v. State Railroad Crossing Board, 119 Mich. 505.

¶ 890. The question how far courts should go in compelling an administrator, by mandamus, to disburse the fund in his hands for which he is answerable in the probate court was not considered, not having been discussed by counsel.—Hayden v. Hefferen, 99 Mich. 262.

¶ 891. Mandamus proceedings to compel the restoration of an alderman to a seat from which he has been wrongfully removed by the council do not concern the legality of his title.—Doran v. De Long, 48 Mich. 552.

¶ 892. The determination of the question of set-off in mandamus to compel a county treasurer to turn over to a city delinquent taxes collected will be left to be considered in an action where the facts can be fully brought out.—City of Sault Ste. Marie v. Hotten, 171 Mich. 265.

¶ 893. Upon an application for mandamus to require a circuit judge to grant a motion made upon a showing of facts before him and which upon the showing he denied, the case must be heard on the facts disclosed on the hearing of the motion in the circuit, and not on new facts brought into the case on this application.—People ex rel. McCarthy v. Monroe Circuit Judge, 36 Mich. 274.

¶ 894. In determining whether a trial court reaches a right conclusion and acts within discretionary powers in requiring a plaintiff to give security for costs under Pub. Acts 1915, No. 314, chap. 13, § 8, the court is not limited to the reasons returned to a writ of mandamus to compel such judge to vacate such order.—Jensen v. Oceana Circuit Judge, 194 Mich. 405.

See also ante ¶ 893.

¶ 895. In mandamus to reverse an order denying extension of time for appeal the stenographer's minutes cannot be considered, where not embodied in the petition below and therefore not passed on below.—Roberge v. De Lisle, 158 Mich. 16.

¶ 896. Upon mandamus to compel the granting of a motion for change of venue, such matter contained in the evidence and brief for relator as was not presented to respondent, and not within the grounds assigned in the motion for a change, will not be considered.—Glazier v. Ingham Circuit Judge, 153 Mich. 481.

¶ 897. The probate court in a proceeding to probate a will has no jurisdiction and does not have the proper parties before it to enter upon an inquiry as to whether the testator actually owned the real estate devised and such a question cannot be raised in a proceeding in mandamus brought in the supreme court to compel the probate court to proceed in the hearing.—Bliss v. Macomb Probate Judge, 129 Mich. 127.

¶ 898. A probate court in a proceeding to probate a will has no jurisdiction to determine whether or not the sole beneficiary is entitled to the property if he murdered the testator and such a question cannot be raised on mandamus in the supreme court to compel the probate judge to proceed with the hearing which he has postponed until after the trial for murder.—Bliss v. Macomb Probate Judge, 129 Mich. 127.

¶ 899. The question of whether an owner can redeem her property in the hands of a tax purchaser, by paying such proportion of the amount bid as her parcel bears to the tract assessed and sold as a whole, cannot be raised on mandamus to the auditor general to which the purchaser is not a party.—Kennedy v. Auditor General, 134 Mich. 534.

¶ 899a. In mandamus to compel the issue of patents to certain lands, it was held that, where patents had already issued to parties who had disposed of the lands so patented to other parties who had not appeared to show cause, and upon whom no process had been served, the rights of such latter parties would not be passed upon, nor would the circuit court order the issuing of another patent for such lands. Whether, in such proceeding, the court could invalidate the prior patent, and whether it could be done in any way except by scire facias for that special purpose, or by bill in chancery, quære.—People ex rel. County of Houghton v. State Land Office Com'r, 23 Mich. 270.

¶ 900. One Erick Norman held a warrant upon the treasurer of a township for work and labor rendered. One Sinna Norman notified the treasurer that she was the undisclosed principal of Erick Norman. Held, that the rights of Sinna Norman, as undisclosed principal could not be litigated in a mandamus proceeding brought by an indorsee of the warrant to compel the township treasurer to pay it.—Ullman v. Sandell, 158 Mich. 496.

Impropriety in mandamus to judicial officer of examination into merits of case whence duty arose, see post § 159.
Unnecessary antecedent question, see also ante ¶ 885.
Trial of right to office collaterally to main issues, see also ante § 20.

¶ 901. The question of the validity of Local Acts 1889, No. 445, consolidating two cities, will not be considered upon applications for mandamus to compel the proper officers of one of the former cities to file a chattel mortgage and issue an execution, which such officers refused to do after their offices had been abolished by the act; and such applications must be refused where the rights of the applicant would have been protected by applying to the proper officer of the new city.—Pistorius v. Stempel, 81 Mich. 133.

¶ 902. Whether a strip of land, described in a resolution of a city common council authorizing its purchase for the purpose of widening a street, is a public highway by user, or not, cannot be determined on mandamus to compel the presiding officer of the council to reverse his decision declaring such resolution carried.—Tennant v. Crocker, 85 Mich. 328.

¶ 903. On mandamus to compel issuance of a certificate to a candidate excluded by counting an improper ballot, which being rejected gives a majority to relator, the other questioned ballots will not be examined.—Christopherson v. Common Council of Manistee, 117 Mich. 125.

¶ 904. Mandamus to compel the payment of salary is not the proper remedy to inquire into the regularity of proceedings which resulted in the suspension and removal of a street commissioner by the city council.—Hartwig v. Mayor and Common Council of Manistee, 134 Mich. 615.

¶ 905. Mandamus to compel the payment of salary cannot be made the proper remedy to test the proceedings of a city council, in suspending and removing the street commissioner, by inferring that there was not some person performing the duties of this office against whom quo warranto could have been brought.—Hartwig v. Mayor and Common Council of Manistee, 134 Mich. 615.

¶ 906. In a mandamus proceeding brought by a property owner to strike an alleged improper assessment from the rolls, the court will not decide whether or not a certain item of property, apparently admitted by both parties to be taxable, shall be subjected to taxation.—W. A. Sturgeon & Co. v. Board Assessors City of Detroit, 159 Mich. 199.

¶ 907. Upon an application for a mandamus to compel a township board to approve the sureties in a liquor bond, it is not the province of this court to decide as matter of fact whether the sureties offered were pecuniarily responsible, but merely whether the board acted in good faith and not arbitrarily or unjustly.—Post v. Sparta Township Board, 64 Mich. 597.

¶ 908. Where mandamus is brought to compel a city council to accept a saloon bond, the court will not go into the question of the sufficiency of the bond, but will only inquire whether the council acted in good faith.—Knabush v. Common Council Village of Britton, 158 Mich. 577.

¶ 909. Plaintiff brought mandamus to compel defendant city council to accept a saloon bond. Held, that the court, on the question whether the council wrongfully rejected the bond, properly refused to permit an inquiry to be made of the members of the council as to whether they would accept a surety company bond.—Knabush v. Common Council Village of Britton, 158 Mich. 577.

¶ 910. In mandamus to compel a county treasurer to pay over to a city delinquent taxes collected where a set-off is claimed of the amount of a check accepted from the city treasurer, the question of diligence of the county treasurer in presenting the check so received for payment, and of lack of notice of the dishonor of the check, should not be considered.—City of Sault Ste. Marie v. Hotten, 171 Mich. 265.

Reviewing antecedent or foundation proceedings collaterally, see also post § 160.
On mandamus to correct improper injunction, see also ante § 45.

¶ 911. The merits will not be tried on application and return of an order to show cause why judicial action should not be compelled.—Chesebro v. Kent Circuit Judge, 70 Mich. 650.

¶ 912. Upon an application for mandamus to vacate an order granting a new trial the questions involved in the trial of the cause will not be reviewed.—Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Genesee Circuit Judge, 89 Mich. 549.

¶ 913. The question of the validity of an assignment for creditors will not be tried on an application for mandamus to vacate an order adjudging the relator guilty of contempt in filing, in a circuit court other than that having jurisdiction of the assignment proceedings, a bill to enjoin a sale of the assigned property.—Smith v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 84 Mich. 564.

¶ 914. On a mandamus to compel punishment of contempt in failing to pay over to an ancillary receiver funds of a corporation, it will not be inquired whether there was a legal incorporation in the domicile state, where its courts recognized that there was one by entertaining winding up proceedings and appointing a domiciliary receiver.—Baldwin v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 101 Mich. 119.

¶ 915. Questions arising during the course of a proceeding will not be reviewed on mandamus, at least where the decision of the lower court was not made on the merits after full consideration, but for the sole purpose of obtaining a ruling by the supreme court.—Walsh v. St. Clair Circuit Judge, 107 Mich. 26.

¶ 916. Defects in an affidavit for an attachment will not be reviewed by the supreme court in a mandamus proceeding to require the allowance of a motion to set aside a service thereof on person and property.—Nederlander v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 55 Mich. 411.

¶ 917. Executors who are restrained by an order of a chancery court from paying moneys to a legatee until a further order of court cannot, upon petition for mandamus to set aside such order, raise the question of insufficiency of service upon the legatee in the chancery suit.—Craig v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 192 Mich. 106.

¶ 918. It will not be determined in mandamus proceedings by a citizen to set aside an order of the recorder's court of the City of Detroit restraining contractors from doing any more work on a building until a case in such court relating to a violation of the Building Code is decided whether the department of building works has acted wisely in neglecting to commence a proceeding in a court of equity.—Adler v. Detroit Recorder's Court Judge, 197 Mich. 81. (Ostrander, J., dissenting.)

General law of collateral attack on judgments, see Judgments, VII.

¶ 919. The sufficiency of an injunction bill cannot be reviewed in collateral proceedings; as upon mandamus to compel a court to proceed with a trial that has been enjoined.—Ives v. Muskegon County Circuit Judge, 40 Mich. 63.

¶ 920. Where a defendant had been sued on a promissory note and had been garnisheed in a suit against the plaintiff and the court directed a stay bond to be given by plaintiff under How. St. § 8105 to protect him as such garnishee and held the case over until the next day, mandamus will not lie to compel the vacation of the order staying the proceedings on the ground that the garnishment suit was instituted for delay and annoyance, as such issues cannot be tried in such a proceeding, nor can it be assumed that this was the object or purpose of the parties litigating upon the mere assertion of a petitioner for mandamus.—Burt v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 82 Mich. 251.

¶ 921. The decree of a circuit court setting aside the charge fixed by the tax law, section 59 (Pub. Acts 1899, No. 262), of $1 for each tax description for each year the lands are delinquent and permitting redemption without payment of such charge, cannot be attacked collaterally in a mandamus proceeding where the court had jurisdiction of the subject matter.—Warren v. Auditor General, 131 Mich. 263.

¶ 922. Mandamus on the ground that an order changing the venue of trial was without jurisdiction will not be granted to compel the circuit court judge to vacate an order in a case removed to his circuit. The proper remedy would be a motion to vacate the order changing the venue and mandamus to review the denial of such motion.—Bradfield v. St. Clair Circuit Judge, 148 Mich. 366.

Showing as to qualifications of delegate in political convention, see also Elections ¶ 89.

Matters to be contained in printed record in mandamus cases in supreme court, see Sup. Ct. Rule 56.

¶ 923. Mandamus to a circuit judge is denied where the record fails to show upon what papers or showing respondent based the action which it is sought to review.—People ex rel. Jones v. Kent Circuit Judge, 34 Mich. 373; People ex rel. McCarthy v. Monroe Circuit Judge, 36 Mich. 274.

¶ 924. Mandamus to compel a police justice to receive a complaint and issue a warrant for violation of the liquor-law was denied where the justice's returns showed no captious disregard of duty.—Sadler v. Sheahan, 92 Mich. 630.

¶ 925. A writ of mandamus to compel a circuit judge to order testimony before a notary in support of a motion for a new trial will be denied on appeal where the record fails to show that the nature of the testimony was disclosed in the motion for a new trial other than to say that it was based on testimony taken and to be taken.—Eikhoff v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 129 Mich. 150.

¶ 926. Mandamus will not lie to compel a judge to grant a change of venue on the ground that a fair and impartial jury cannot be obtained in the county where the case is pending, where the record does not establish this fact.—Campbell v. Jackson Circuit Judge, 155 Mich. 326.

¶ 927. Upon petition for mandamus to compel a county board to pay to a township which had been set off from the county a balance shown by the county books to be due, the answer stated no facts from which error in the books could be inferred. The writ was granted.—Township of Roscommon v. Midland Board Sup'rs, 49 Mich. 454.

¶ 928. Under Pub. Acts 1899, No. 107, § 127, providing for the placing of lands upon the state tax homestead list, the existence as matter of record of all enumerated essential facts except as to the pendency of suits is sufficient to justify the denial of a writ of mandamus to desist from such action where the answer signifies an intention not to include lands against which suits are or may be pending.—Alcona County Sup'rs v. Auditor General, 138 Mich. 491.

¶ 929. Where the fairness of a recount had in a case not within the statute providing for recounts was denied by relator and by nine of the twenty-one members of the board of canvassers, the others making a conflicting return, mandamus was granted to compel the issue of a certificate to the candidate originally declared elected.—Belknap v. Board of Canvassers of Ionia County, 94 Mich. 516.

¶ 930. Mandamus will lie to compel the vacation of a judgment by default where the sworn statement of the judgment debtor that there was no personal service upon him is contradicted only by a return of service made by a private person, and the relator further shows that he had no knowledge of any of the proceedings in the cause until after the expiration of the time allowed for suing out a writ of error, and that he moved to set them aside as soon as he did learn of them, and the testimony brought up with the petition fails to disclose any liability on his part to plaintiff in the action.—Campbell v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 111 Mich. 247.

¶ 931. A return that in fixing the conditions of a liquor bond respondents, a common council, determined that to require four sureties "would operate as a wholesome salutary restraint against the well known vicious tendencies of such places," shows that its action in rejecting a bond with only two sureties was not grounded on their insufficiency.—Power v. Common Council of Village of Litchfield, 141 Mich. 350.

¶ 932. On an application for mandamus to require the county treasurer to pay an order drawn by persons claiming to be superintendents of the poor, the legal title of the officers will not be tried; but it appearing on the record that their appointment was unauthorized, mandamus will not be granted unless it appears that, notwithstanding the want of title, they have got actual possession and are generally reputed to be such officers, and are hence officers de facto.—People ex rel. Mead v. Ingham County Treasurer, 36 Mich. 416.

¶ 933. Mandamus to compel judicial action will not issue where the return to the order to show cause reveals that respondent has been ready and willing on showing and motion to make a proper interlocutory decree, and that after service on him of the order a motion for final decree was made on which action is withheld only because of the pendency of the mandamus application.—Chesebro v. Kent Circuit Judge, 70 Mich. 650.

¶ 934. A highway commissioner is not compelled by mandamus to repair a bridge where his return to the writ states that in his opinion the cost would exceed $1,000.—Travis v. Skinner, 72 Mich. 152.

¶ 935. Mandamus in behalf of persons accused of murder will not be granted to compel the sheriff to bring relators before a certain circuit commissioner in order that they may be admitted to bail, where the answer shows that respondent has good reason to believe that such commissioner is disqualified, and where no issue is asked to try the question; there appearing to be another commissioner and a circuit judge, by either of whom, it is presumed, relators may be admitted to bail.—Elder v. Garner, 97 Mich. 617.

¶ 936. Where a request by bill by the relator for a preliminary injunction was denied by the circuit judge, and in his return to a mandamus proceeding to compel him to issue such preliminary injunction the judge shows there is no present necessity for the same, and that he will proceed to hear the bill on its merits, the writ of mandamus will not issue.—Mahon v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 154 Mich. 497.

Construction and effect of the record, see ante §§ 161, 162.
Restriction of matters considered to the record as returned, see ante § 155.
Presumptions as to available relief from other judicial officers, see also ante ¶ 935.
General presumptions of law and fact, see Evidence, II.
General presumption as to due and regular performance of duty, see Evidence §§ 37, 38.
Presumption that official action will be duly and regularly completed by proper order and entry, see also Evidence ¶ 229.
Presumptions on writ of error as to matters not disclosed by record, see Appeal, XII, C.
Presumptions on certiorari as to matters not stated or disclosed in return, see Certiorari § 59.
Presumption as to correctness of public service rates as based on reported earnings, see Public Service.

¶ 937. In mandamus proceedings to enforce the payment of money, as in any other, the claimant must make out his own case unless it is admitted expressly or by implication; the burden is not on the respondent to show that the demand is illegal.—Hosier v. Higgins Township Board, 45 Mich. 340.

¶ 938. Matters stated in the application for a mandamus which are neither admitted nor denied by the answer cannot be insisted on by the relator on the argument if he goes to a hearing without proofs.—People ex rel. Estabrook v. Pritchard, 19 Mich. 470.

¶ 939. In mandamus to the supreme court to compel a circuit judge to grant a temporary injunction, the burden is upon relators to show that in refusing said injunction the circuit judge did not use proper discretion.—Early v. Ingham Circuit Judge, 166 Mich. 517.

¶ 940. On application for a peremptory mandamus, commanding the state treasurer to pay the relator such sum as he was entitled to as holder of some of the circulating notes of the Government Stock Bank, out of the avails of the stocks deposited with the state treasurer, it was not necessary that the affidavits should show that the notes were countersigned as required by law. The averment that they were issued by the bank necessarily implied this.—People ex rel. Duffield v. Holmes, 3 Mich. 544.

¶ 941. Mandamus to compel a municipal board to approve a liquor dealer's bond will be denied if there is nothing to show that the refusal to approve it was capricious, or to rebut the presumption that the board has fairly passed upon all the questions which determine the sufficiency of the bond and the reliability of the sureties.—Parker v. Portland Board of Trustees, 54 Mich. 308; Post v. Sparta Township Board, 64 Mich. 597; McHenry v. Township of Chippewa, 65 Mich. 9.

¶ 942. When, upon an order to show cause, no reason is given for the rejection of a liquor bond, it may be assumed to have been rejected arbitrarily.—Amperse v. Kalamazoo Common Council, 59 Mich. 78.

¶ 943. Mandamus to compel a city clerk to issue a warrant will not be refused because of failure of the petition to allege that there are sufficient funds available to pay it where the refusal was not based on such ground and there is no showing that there is not in fact funds available.—Smedley v. Kirby, 120 Mich. 253.

¶ 944. In mandamus to compel the payment of a street commissioner's salary for the time during which he was suspended in the alleged violation of the law, it will be assumed that his subsequent dismissal shows that he was incompetent and thus not entitled to the salary during the period of his suspension.—Hartwig v. Mayor and Common Council of Manistee, 134 Mich. 615.

¶ 945. An injunction not made part of the record in contempt proceedings for an alleged violation thereof will not be assumed on mandamus to have been broader than the prayer of the bill.—Detroit & B. P. R. Co. v. Detroit Citizens' St. R. Co., 97 Mich. 583.

¶ 946. A chancery order which does not purport upon its face to have been made by consent, and therefore beyond the power to vacate, and which was not considered by the circuit judge as having been so made on the hearing of a motion, which he granted, to vacate it, will not be treated as such on an application for a mandamus to compel him to vacate an order granting said motion.—Fifth National Bank v. Clinton Circuit Judge, 100 Mich. 67.

¶ 947. Under Comp. L. 1897, § 11163, providing for taxation of costs on judgment for defendant in forcible entry and detainer in the same manner as provided for costs of a complainant recovering judgment, the taxation of costs by the commissioner is presumed regular; and the complainant is not entitled to mandamus to compel the commissioner to make a return for an appeal, refused on account of nonpayment of costs, although the costs were apparently taxed without notice to the complainant and subsequent to his taking an appeal.—Stuart v. Corlette, 129 Mich. 611.

Presumptions as to matters not alleged, see ante § 163.
Admissions by demurrer to petition, see post § 165.
Taking answer as true, see post §§ 166, 167.
Rule in supreme court cases, see Sup. Ct. Rule 13.
Rule in circuit courts, see 1916 C. C. Rule 50, § 3.

¶ 948. A failure to make answer to the order to show cause admits the facts set forth in the petition, and if sufficient for relief the writ will issue thereon.—People ex rel. Davis v. Common Council of Lansing, 31 Mich. 490.

¶ 949. A statement of fact in a petition for mandamus must be taken as true unless denied in the answer.—Berube v. Wheeler, 128 Mich. 32; Hoffman v. Auditor General, 136 Mich. 689; Barlow v. Riker, 138 Mich. 607.

¶ 950. An averment in a petition for mandamus not expressly denied, but admitted to be true in part, in the answer, will be taken as true.—Jones v. Board of Education of City of Detroit, 88 Mich. 371.

¶ 951. Under Supreme Court Rule 63 (new rule 13), which provides that "In proceedings for mandamus, where an order to show cause has been made, respondent must answer fully every material allegation of the petition, and every material averment not so answered may be taken admitted by respondent to be true as alleged, and, in case no answer is made and filed as required by such order, the court, upon due proof of service of the order, will award a peremptory mandamus as prayed for, or enforce obedience to the order by process for contempt," the failure of the judge of the superior court of Grand Rapids to answer an order to show cause why he should not be compelled to vacate an order by him made dismissing the petition of the city of Grand Rapids for the establishment of permanent dock, safety, sanitary, and building lines along the shores and margins and in the waters and on the bed of Grand river, as provided by Act 358, Local Acts of 1891, on the ground that said act is unconstitutional, amounts to an admission by respondent and the contesting property-owners that all of the material averments of the petition for the writ are true, and a peremptory mandamus should issue as prayed.—City of Grand Rapids v. Burlingame (Judge of Superior Court, Grand Rapids), 102 Mich. 321.

Admission of facts in answer by demurrer thereto, see post § 167.

¶ 952. Where a petition for a mandamus to compel a sale of certain public land simply alleged that the land in question was subject to entry at a specified sum on July 1, 1850, a demurrer thereto did not admit that it was subject to such entry at any subsequent time.—People ex rel. Chapman v. State Land Office Com'r, 26 Mich. 146.

Assumed truth of affidavits, see post § 168.

Taking return as true in certiorari, see Certiorari § 56.

Taking answer to petition as true where whole mandamus record goes up in certiorari, see Certiorari § 56, ¶¶ 206, 207.

¶ 953. Where a circuit judge is called upon to show cause against a mandamus, his return, stating the facts as to his own action, and what occurred in connection therewith within his own knowledge, must be conclusively taken to be true, and as issue of fact cannot be made upon it.—People ex rel. Orr v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 23 Mich. 536.

¶ 954. In mandamus cases where the matter is heard on petition and answer, the answer is to be taken as true; and where the answer states that certain officers who, it was claimed, had been illegally removed, have retained the files and records of their offices, have constantly denied the right to make the removal, and have continued to act as officers, is conclusive against the claim of the new appointees that they have acted as such officers with general acquiescence in their right.—People ex rel. Mead v. Ingham County Treasurer, 36 Mich. 416.

¶ 955. On an application for mandamus where the answer is responsive or does not admit relator's case, and he sees fit to go to a hearing on the pleadings, the answer is taken as true, and determines the propriety of issuing the writ.—Merrill v. Gladwin County Treasurer, 61 Mich. 95.

¶ 956. In mandamus to compel the lower court to vacate an order dissolving an injunction, on the ground that the court acted arbitrarily and did not employ its discretion, the return of the lower court that he did exercise his discretion will not be disputed where the facts indicate the probable correctness of his decision.—McQuater v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 158 Mich. 46.

See also ante ¶ 27.

Demurring to petition as admitting truth, see ante § 165.

Statutory provision for taking answer or return as true in absence of issue taken thereon, see Jud. Act, chap. XXXVI, § 4; Comp. L. 1915, § 13440.

¶ 957. Under the Judicature Act, Pub. Acts 1915, No. 314, chap. 36, § 4, all material facts stated in the return or answer in a mandamus proceeding that are not specifically denied by plea are taken as admitted to be true.—Michigan R. Commission v. Detroit & M. Ry. Co., 192 Mich. 426.

¶ 958. Under the Jud. Act, chap. XXXVI, § 4; Comp. L. 1915, § 13440, providing that all material facts stated in a return to a writ of mandamus, not specifically denied by plea, shall be taken as admitted to be true, where no issue is joined in such proceedings the answer of respondent is conclusive as to the facts.—Yerkes v. Antrim Circuit Judge, 200 Mich. 443.

¶ 959. An answer to a writ of mandamus which is not traversed must be accepted as true.—Marsh v. Kent Circuit Judge, 200 Mich. 579.

¶ 960. If in mandamus proceedings, no issues are framed, the proceeding will be disposed of on the issues raised by the petition and answer and under 1897 C. C. Rule 46, subd. c, all averments of fact in the answer and all material allegations in the petition not specifically answered will be assumed to be true.—Lewis v. Board of Education of City of Detroit, 139 Mich. 306.

¶ 961. The facts stated in the answer or the return to an order to show cause are taken as true if no issue is made upon it.—Murphy v. Reeder Township Treasurer, 56 Mich. 505; Farnsworth v. Kalkaska County Sup'rs, 56 Mich. 640; Hickey v. Oakland County Sup'rs, 62 Mich. 94; Post v. Sparta Township Board, 63 Mich. 323; Detroit Tug & Wrecking Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 75 Mich. 360; Smith v. Auditor General, 80 Mich. 205; Fort Street Union Depot Co. v. State Railroad Crossing Board, 81 Mich. 248; Auditor General v. Midland County Sup'rs, 84 Mich. 121; Village of Grosse Pointe v. Treasurer of Wayne County, 85 Mich. 44; Smith v. Board of State Auditors, 85 Mich. 407; Grondin v. Logan, 88 Mich. 247; Tyler v. Oceana County Sup'rs, 93 Mich. 448; Double v. McQueen, 96 Mich. 39; City of Benton Harbor v. St. Joseph & B. H. St. R. Co., 102 Mich. 386; Porter v. Edwards, 114 Mich. 640; Smith v. Livingston County Sup'rs, 115 Mich. 202; Keeler v. Deo, 117 Mich. 1; Indiana Road Machine Co. v. Keeney, 147 Mich. 184; Attorney General v. State Board of Agriculture, 152 Mich. 689; Bauer v. Township Board of Denmark, 157 Mich. 395; McNamara v. Kent Circuit Judge, 173 Mich. 602; Alderson v. Newaygo Circuit Judge, 173 Mich. 608.

¶ 962. The return, if demurred to, must be taken as true.—Edwards v. United States, 103 U. S. 471, 26 L. ed. 314.

¶ 963. Facts set up by respondent in his return to an order to show cause are admitted by the relator if, when an issue is framed, they are not submitted to the jury. —Loomis v. Rogers Township Board, 53 Mich. 135.

¶ 964. Where a mandamus proceeding is left to stand upon the answer to the order to show cause, the answer must be taken as true.—Farnsworth v. Kalkaska County Sup'rs, 56 Mich. 640.

¶ 965. Where the facts appearing upon the face of its records and proceedings show that the statements of a respondent board of supervisors made in its answer to a mandamus proceeding are not true, the answer will not be taken as true, although no issues were framed.—Lewis v. Board Sup'rs Montmorency Co., 164 Mich. 595.

¶ 966. Mandamus was brought to compel the county board of supervisors to allow a bill for board of certain jurors, and the board made return alleging that they had considered the claim, found it exorbitant and allowed a lesser sum which was reasonable compensation. Issue was not joined upon this question and the writ was denied. On certiorari, held that such return was conclusive.—Thornton v. Gratiot County Sup'rs, 131 Mich. 539.

¶ 967. In mandamus where no issue is joined, the answer of the respondent must be taken as conclusive of the facts, and therefore of the existence of the grounds urged and defenses offered to a stockholder's bill on which respondent refused to continue an injunction against corporate acts.—George N. Fletcher & Sons v. Alpena Circuit Judge, 136 Mich. 511.

¶ 968. In mandamus to compel the state railroad commissioner to vacate an order requiring an overhead crossing, the return of the commissioner that he viewed the premises and determined the necessity, must be taken as true where no issue is made.—Jackson & Suburban Traction Co. v. Commissioner of Railroads, 128 Mich. 164.

¶ 969. Where in a proceeding against a county board of canvassers to compel it to reconvene and change the result of its recount of primary election votes had before them, no issue is asked for by the relator on the defendant's answer, the statement of facts stated in such answer must be taken as true.—Abbott v. Board Canvassers Montcalm Co., 172 Mich. 416.

¶ 970. An answer stating that an alleged insane is not a "resident" of the state will be taken as true against petitioner seeking to compel admission to a state asylum, where petitioner's contention is that under Pub. Acts 1897, No. 44, and those preceding it, excluding all but "citizens" of the state from such commitments the legislature used "citizen" in the sense of "resident."—Porter v. Edwards, 114 Mich. 640.

Affidavit as proper mode of answer to order to show cause, see ante § 142.

Impropriety of affidavits attached to return as pleadings of justification, see ante ¶ 851.

¶ 971. It seems that affidavits in answer to an order to show cause cannot be assumed to be evasive, and if so in fact the respondent will be bound by them according to the interpretation evidently intended.—Attorney General v. Sanilac County Sup'rs, 42 Mich. 72.

¶ 972. Ex parte affidavits returned by a circuit judge in response to an order to show cause why he should not grant a motion will not be received if they were not used on the motion.—Churchill v. Alpena Circuit Judge, 56 Mich. 536.

¶ 973. An answer in mandamus should not be contradicted by affidavits, but if the relator desires to dispute the answer issues should be settled and tried in an orderly manner.—Webster v. Wheeler, 119 Mich. 601.

[Note. Owing to the nature of mandamus the facts are established by the pleadings and the allegations therein taken as true or admitted in the majority of cases, and the precedents on the application of the rules of evidence in ordinary sense are few. For the propriety of matter contained in the petition or answer and return and its sufficiency as proof, see ante §§ 135-138, 143, 144, 161-168. For the issues open to consideration, see ante §§ 154-160. For the general law of evidence, see Evidence.]

Evidence to show expiration of respondent's office, see also ante ¶ 811.

Sufficiency of record showing, see also ante § 161 et seq.

Effect of contradictions in the record, see ante § 161.

¶ 974. In a mandamus proceeding to compel the commissioner of highways of a township to erect a bridge, opinion evidence as to the necessity of a bridge over the stream is not competent.—Berube v. Wheeler, 128 Mich. 32.

¶ 975. In mandamus to compel a school board to issue a warrant for money appropriated to the payment for construction, evidence that the treasurer, at the annual meeting, reported the surplus over the previous year as part of the school fund on hand, and that thereupon the meeting passed a resolution to raise by tax, a definite sum for school purposes, is not sufficient to show an intent to appropriate the surplus mill-tax for school purposes in the absence of definite action to that effect.—Banhagel v. School Board of Dist. No. 1 of Bronson and Bethel Townships, 134 Mich. 455.

¶ 976. On mandamus to compel a common council to pass on a liquor bond with the statutory number of sureties, where it appeared from the return that it rejected the proffered bond on an untenable ground not replated to the sufficiency of it, a finding that its rejection was in good faith is immaterial.—Power v. Common Council of Village of Litchfield, 141 Mich. 350.

Recovery of damages as bar to further action for making false return, see Jud. Act, chap. XXXVI, § 6; Comp. L. 1915, § 13442.

¶ 977. How. St. § 8666, in providing that a peremptory mandamus shall be granted at once where a verdict is found for relator, does not apply if material issues have not been submitted to the jury and found in his favor (Pub. L. 1883, Act No. 63).—Loomis v. Rogers Township Board, 53 Mich. 135.

Amendment of order to show cause, see ante § 140.

¶ 978. As obedience to a mandamus is to be enforced by process for contempt the writ should point out the precise thing to be done.—Diamond Match Co. v. Powers, 51 Mich. 145.

¶ 979. The supreme court in a mandamus case may grant relief where a case is made out in part, even if it fails in other respects.—Hosier v. Higgins Township Board, 45 Mich. 340.

¶ 980. Judicial discretion is always involved in mandamus cases, concerning the relief as well as other questions.—People ex rel. Ayres v. State Board of Auditors, 42 Mich. 422.

¶ 981. The relator in mandamus is not usually granted greater relief than is claimed in his application for the writ.—People ex rel. Reeder v. Wexford County Treasurer, 87 Mich. 351.

¶ 982. Relief cannot be given as against the interests of any person not made a party to the proceeding and duly notified.—People ex rel. Austin v. Curtis, 41 Mich. 728.

¶ 983. Upon an application for a mandamus to compel the circuit court to set aside defective attachment proceedings, the supreme court cannot grant leave to amend the sheriff's return of sale.—People v. Calhoun Circuit Judges, 1 D. 417.

¶ 984. Mandamus to compel the payment of money may be granted so far as concerns a portion of the demand, while as to the rest the application is dismissed.—Bryant v. Moore, 50 Mich. 225.

¶ 985. A writ of mandamus will not issue to vacate an order of the circuit court where the relator is only entitled to a modification of the order.—Flint & P. M. R. Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 108 Mich. 80.

¶ 986. In mandamus proceedings to compel the council of a village to approve a liquor bond, where the action of the council appears to have been taken in good faith and without passing upon the sufficiency of the sureties, the circuit court, in granting the relief, should compel the council to approve the bond only after examining into the sufficiency of the sureties and upon finding them sufficient.—Hawkins v. Common Council of Village of Litchfield, 120 Mich. 390.

¶ 987. A writ of mandamus issued to compel an express company to carry goods, and requiring the company to pay the war stamp tax imposed by the Act of June 13, 1898, should not be limited to affect only the parties to the suit, it appearing that the express company was attempting to compel all customers to pay the tax.—Attorney General ex rel. Moore v. American Exp. Co., 118 Mich. 682, reversed in 177 U. S. 404, 44 L. ed. 823, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 695.

¶ 988. Although mandamus will lie to compel a city council to appropriate money to meet the expenses of a charter commission, as provided by Act No. 279, Pub. Acts 1909, the writ will not be framed so as to compel the council to adopt the particular resolution proposed by the relator.—Attorney General v. Mayor & Common Council, City of Adrian, 164 Mich. 143.

¶ 989. On mandamus to compel the Board of State Canvassers to reconvene and recanvass a vote, where the only error was the want of proper authentication of their canvass, the record will be treated as sufficient without reconvening them for that purpose. —Rich v. Board of State Canvassers, 100 Mich. 458.

¶ 990. On mandamus to compel retaxation of costs, an item having been disallowed because the respondent deemed it to be altogether unwarranted by law, though it was open to objection as excessive as claimed, a direction was given to reduce the claim by the amount of excess and, as so reduced, to retax costs accordingly.—McGilvray v. Manistee Circuit Judge, 146 Mich. 480.

¶ 991. On mandamus to compel vacation of an order sending issues to a jury in a suit to annul marriage, the order having been made pursuant to How. St. § 6622, and bearing evidence that the judge ordered the issues to a jury because he thought their verdict would be binding, it is proper for the supreme court to consider and determine that such verdict is advisory only and to revise the order accordingly.—Maier v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 112 Mich. 491.

¶ 992. On mandamus to compel vacation of an injunction, which was granted to prevent payment of exempt money, and to compel vacation of an order for temporary maintenance, entered on a special appearance by the husband not a resident of the state for the purpose of moving to dissolve the injunction, the maintenance order was not interfered with; since if it was void it could not be enforced, and if not void it was a matter of discretion.—Hunt v. Branch Circuit Judge, 141 Mich. 423.

Denial of order to show cause where petition is deficient, see ante § 139, ¶ 885.

Dismissal of petition for defects, see ante § 146.

Partial allowance of writ, see ante § 172.

Rendition of advisory judgment or opinion where mandamus proceeding is defective or improper, see post § 174.

¶ 993. Terms cannot be imposed on the relator when the writ is awarded, if he asks no more than his legal right.—People ex rel. Barrett v. Bacon, 18 Mich. 247.

¶ 994. Mandamus to set aside an order of removal to a federal court was denied without looking into the merits where the record did not show that any application had been made to the respondent to vacate the order. —Le Roux v. Bay Circuit Judge, 45 Mich. 416.

¶ 995. Mandamus to pay a township order based upon a settlement which the answer claimed to be wrong was limited to the amount conceded by the answer to be due, no issue of fact being made; but the allowance of the writ was without prejudice to any action by either party for the correction of the error.—Murphy v. Reeder Township, 57 Mich. 419.

¶ 996. Where county treasurer, after paying over to village under mistake of fact, liquor-tax moneys legally belonging to township, deducted amount thus paid from village's share of subsequent tax, mandamus to compel him to pay over was denied without prejudice to other remedies.—Village of Grosse Pointe v. Treasurer of Wayne County, 85 Mich. 44.

¶ 997. The supreme court on the hearing after answer to an order to show cause conditionally denied a peremptory writ to compel respondent common council to grant a liquor license, where it appeared that a former license had been revoked by it on the erroneous ground that by a certain conviction of crime a cause of revocation had accrued, and appeared further that grant of a license for the ensuing year was denied on the ground of said prior forfeiture; since it is supposable that on being informed of the law the council will consider the application for the license without regard to the illegal forfeiture.—Cox v. Jackson Common Council, 152 Mich. 630.

¶ 998. In mandamus to compel boards of supervisors of counties to rebuild a bridge over a river, where it appeared that there was a prospect of an early agreement between the boards to erect the bridge, the application for the writ was denied with leave to renew it if a bridge was not built within a reasonable time.—Oxby v. Boards of Supervisors of Kalkaska and Antrim Counties, 124 Mich. 463.

¶ 999. Decree was entered against relator, without proofs, upon consent of his counsel. Subsequently he filed a petition with the circuit judge for a rehearing, asking that the decree be set aside, and that he be permitted to defend upon the merits. The petition, which was defective in that it was not accompanied by the certificate of counsel, as required by 1897 Chancery Rule 25, to the effect that they believed the decree erroneous in the particulars mentioned in the petition, was denied. Relator, although the lapse of time had not been such as to prevent the filing of a new petition, made application for mandamus to compel the circuit judge to set aside the decree and permit him to enter his defense. Held, that the peremptory writ should be denied, but without prejudice to the right to present the question anew, upon proper showing, to the circuit judge.—Manley v. Kalamazoo Circuit Judge, 114 Mich. 525.

¶ 1000. On granting a mandamus to compel the circuit judge to vacate an order retaining an appeal for trial of a condemnation case, where the appeal was void because attempted to be taken under Comp. L. 1897, § 669, which covers no such case, leave was given to apply in the supreme court for a writ of certiorari in view of the fact that the time for taking a common law certiorari in the ordinary course had elapsed and in view of the circumstances of the case, the propriety of taking an appeal under that statute having had some seeming sanction in a previous decision of the supreme court and been settled negatively in the case at bar.—United States Gypsum Co. v. Kent Circuit Judge, 150 Mich. 668.

¶ 1001. Mandamus will not lie where a writ of error may be used but the court having issued the order in the cause under consideration and the parties having filed their briefs the question will be disposed of.—Detroit, G. R. & W. R. Co. v. Eaton Circuit Judge, 128 Mich. 495.

¶ 1002. While an appeal and not mandamus is the proper remedy where the circuit court in chancery has improvidently issued a restraining order which has in effect deprived a party of his possession, use, and control of his property without a hearing on the merits, yet, the court on mandamus expressed its views with "no doubt that the circuit judge will vacate the order upon a renewal of the application, and upon being advised of the view taken by this court."—State Road Bridge Co. v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 143 Mich. 337.

¶ 1003. A state's attorney applied by mandamus to compel a judge to set aside an order for a change of venue, without first having entered a motion asking the judge to vacate the order. Held that, in view of the fact that the public interest required it, and that the mandamus proceeding had been fully briefed and argued, the court would consider the mandamus on its merits.—Bresnahan v. Cass Circuit Judge, 154 Mich. 491.

¶ 1004. The proper proceeding to review mandamus proceedings is certiorari; but, where the case brought improperly on mandamus was briefed by both parties, the case was treated by the supreme court as an application for certiorari and the questions presented disposed of.—Chicago, D. & C. G. T. Junct. R. Co. v. St. Clair Circuit Judge, 156 Mich. 567.

Sufficiency of record showing as to readiness to perform, see ante § 162.

¶ 1005. Mandamus to compel a board of county supervisors to pass upon relator's claim was denied, where the answer, taken as true, set forth that upon receiving the order to show cause, respondent met and notified relator of the time and place for hearing his claim, that it met, rescinded its former resolution submitting it to the electors, and disallowed the claim.—Gallagher v. Cheboygan Co. Sup'rs, 119 Mich. 271.

¶ 1006. Mandamus to the board of supervisors to reconvene and canvass vote for county seat's removal, will not issue where board alleges in response to a rule to show cause, that it has not refused to canvass votes, but that it will do so on an adjourned day.—Double v. McQueen, 96 Mich. 39, citing Belknap v. Board of Canvassers, decided December 3, 1892, without opinion.

Stay of proceedings pending mandamus, see Stay, II.

¶ 1007. A petition by a railroad company for the recalling or suspension of a peremptory writ of mandamus to enforce an order of the Michigan Railroad Commission pending the determination of a chancery case to review such order should be denied where the holding that the writ of mandamus to enforce the order should issue has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the new matter contained in the railway company's petition and not before the court when the mandamus was ordered was involved in the issue made in the pleadings in a pending chancery case, which had been appealed to the supreme court.—Michigan R. Commission v. Detroit & M. Ry. Co., 192 Mich. 426.

¶ 1008. On suspension of mandamus proceedings by a city to compel a street railway company to pave its tracks with brick, by agreement without prejudice to the rights of either party, the fact that the railway company proceeds to pave with macadam does not foreclose the right of the city to proceed with the case as if no agreement had been entered into.—City of Detroit v. Detroit United Ry., 172 Mich. 496.

MARRIAGE.

TREATS of the formation and fact of the marriage relationship and the proof of it as a fact and suits to establish judicially the nonexistence of a pretended marriage. It excludes the rights and status of the spouses (Husband and Wife) and suits to dissolve existing marriages for cause (Divorce), actionable breach of promise to marry (Breach of Promise), and civil and criminal liability for seduction under promise of marriage (Seduction). Crimes relating to marriage or offensive thereto are treated in Crimes, II; Indictment.

¶ 2. A marriage ceremony performed in one county by a justice of the peace of another, being followed by cohabitation, is sufficient to constitute the parties husband and wife.—People v. Girdler, 65 Mich. 68.

¶ 3. There is no valid marriage, though a ceremony is performed by a magistrate, where the woman, instead of assenting to the contract, positively dissents from it and never lives with the man.—Roszel v. Roszel, 73 Mich. 133.

¶ 4. Under Pub. Acts 1897, Act No. 180, § 1, conferring authority on judges of probate to perform the marriage ceremony in certain specified cases where the application for license is accompanied by the written request of the parent or guardian of the minor, where only one of the parties is under the marriageable age, the conditions fixed by the act must be complied with before the officer is authorized to act.—People v. Schoonmaker, 119 Mich. 242.

¶ 5. A marriage ceremony is not necessary to constitute a valid marriage in this state.—Lorimer v. Lorimer, 124 Mich. 631.

¶ 6. No formal ceremony is essential to the validity of a marriage.—Supreme Tent Knights of the Maccabees v. McAllister, 132 Mich. 69.

¶ 7. The test of a common law marriage is, did the parties presently agree to take each other for husband and wife and live together in that relation.—Judson v. Judson, 147 Mich. 518.

¶ 8. A marriage in fact may be shown by proof of an agreement between two persons of opposite sex to take each other presently as husband and wife, consummated by cohabitation.—People v. Mendenhall, 119 Mich. 404.

¶ 9. Marriage may be solemnized in Michigan otherwise than by a person actually authorized to do so, however the law may be elsewhere.—People v. Perriman, 72 Mich. 184.

¶ 10. On the question whether or not a common-law marriage existed, an instruction that in the absence of a valid marriage ceremony, a simple agreement to live together, even though the parties intended to carry out the agreement, was sufficient to constitute a valid marriage is erroneous as excluding the condition that the agreement be acted upon by living together and cohabiting as husband and wife.—Lorimer v. Lorimer, 124 Mich. 631.

¶ 11. A contract of marriage may be made and the relation of husband and wife established without proof of a formal ceremony conducted by a clergyman or magistrate, and without proof by actual witnesses to the making of the contract.—People v. Spencer, 199 Mich. 395.

¶ 12. As relating to a common-law marriage cohabitation means dwelling together, living in the usual manner of married people, a manifestation that the parties have consented between themselves to contract the marriage relation, a holding forth to the world by daily life, conduct, demeanor, habit, that the man and woman who live together have agreed to marriage, and to stand to each other in the mutual relation of husband and wife.—People v. Spencer, 199 Mich. 395.

¶ 14. The following was held not to be a marriage contract or a valid contract of any kind: "An article of agreement made and entered into by and between Mrs. Mary McCarthy of Chicago, Illinois, and Dennis Clancy, of Detroit, Michigan. We mutually and jointly, from now henceforth and forever, agree to live as man and wife, but each party retains the right to levy, sell and transfer their respective properties without question of the other party. Mrs. Mary McCarthy, Dennis Clancy. Witness: Hugh Murray, Emma Murray." And though followed by cohabitation, it was held there was no evidence of marriage.—Clancy v. Clancy, 66 Mich. 202.

¶ 15. A marriage contract, without ceremony, cannot be valid if a ceremonial marriage would be unlawful under the same circumstances, as where one of the parties has a husband or wife living.—People v. Seaman, 107 Mich. 348.

¶ 16. Where a man obtains a marriage certificate, shows it to a woman, says it is too late to get a minister and that they will come back the next day, to which she agrees, takes the woman to his father's home and introduces her as his wife, tells the woman that night that a ceremony is unnecessary, lives with her several years and they are regarded as husband and wife by those with whom they associate, and there is no legal impediment to a marriage, a valid marriage is created.—Severance v. Severance, 197 Mich. 327.

Presumption as to nonceremonial marriage in foreign state, see post ¶ 37.

¶ 17. Marriage, between parties capable of contracting it, is of common right and valid by the common law of Christendom. As a general rule, if valid where celebrated it is valid everywhere, and if void where celebrated it is void everywhere. Regulations restricting it or imposing conditions upon it are exceptional, depend upon statutes, and must be proved by one who claims a case falls within them.—Hutchins v. Kimmell, 31 Mich. 126.

¶ 18. Marriage by a divorced person without the state where the divorce was granted, during the period within which the statute of such state forbids remarriage, is valid, where he has acquired a domicile in the state where the marriage was contracted.—People v. Steere, 184 Mich. 556.

¶ 19. A marriage in a certain county of the state of Michigan between persons nonresident in such county, held valid, notwithstanding one of the parties may have made a false affidavit as to her residence in such county in securing a license for the marriage for which she would be subject to penalty under Comp. L. 1897, § 8602 et seq., How. 2nd Ed., § 11437 et seq.—Switchmen's Union of North America v. Gillerman, 196 Mich. 141.

See also post ¶ 25.

Marriage in anticipation of divorce, followed by cohabitation, see post § 9.

Crime of bigamy, see Crimes, II; Indictment.

¶ 20. Bigamy means more than the meretricious relation of one who has a husband or wife living; it imports a form or ceremony of marriage by a spouse who has a lawful husband or wife living.—In re Dettman's Estate, 195 Mich. 231.

¶ 21. Where a person who has contracted a bigamous marriage with a woman having no knowledge of his prior marriage holds such woman out to the public as his wife after the death of his wife by the first marriage she must be regarded as his legal wife at the time of his death, although he dies without knowledge of the death of the first wife.—In re Fitzgibbons' Estate, 162 Mich. 416. (Per Moore, J.; Bird, C. J., Blair and Stone, JJ., concurring; Brooke, Ostrander, Hooker and McAlvay, JJ., dissenting.)

¶ 22. Where a man, after a decree of divorce under which he was prohibited from remarrying, enters into a ceremonial marriage, and a deed is executed to him and his supposed wife by the later marriage, which does not describe them as husband and wife, but is to them both as grantees, and to their heirs and assigns, they take as tenants in common; and where, after the death of his supposed wife, the man marries again, and with his third wife conveys to a third person, taking back a reconveyance to himself and his third wife as tenants by the entirety, they take only one-half interest in the land as tenants in common with the heirs of the supposed second wife.—Wright v. Kaynor, 150 Mich. 7.

¶ 23a. A marriage of a woman below the age of consent by a secret ceremony before the probate judge, which ceremony was inefficacious because there was no consent of a guardian as required by Pub. Acts 1897, No. 180, is void without further process under How. St. § 6224, where there was no cohabitation following the marriage or after attaining age of consent.—People v. Schoonmaker, 119 Mich. 242.

Incapacity of insane or feeble-minded persons, see Comp. L. 1915, § 11367.

Validation of marriages between whites and negroes, see Comp. L. 1915, § 11367.

¶ 24. Comp. L. 1871, § 4719, How. St. § 6209, declaring males of eighteen and females of sixteen legally capable of "contracting marriage," refers to the actual forming of the marriage relation; and while it makes such marriages valid, it does not empower infants to make executory contracts of marriage that will sustain action for breach of promise.—Frost v. Vought, 37 Mich. 65.

¶ 25. A man and woman lived together as if they were husband and wife for twenty years and had thirteen children. Then they separated, and, during the man's life, the woman was formally married to another man, who lived with her nearly three years and then married another woman while the first was still living. Held, that the first couple were husband and wife, and the following marriage therefore void, so that the last marriage was valid and the woman entitled to claim a widow's share of her husband's estate upon his death.—Peet v. Peet, 52 Mich. 464.

Actionable fraud, see post § 10.

Evidence of pregnancy and birth of child as bearing on fraud, see post § 15.

Concealed pregnancy as ground for annulment, see post § 17.

General law of fraud, see Fraud.

¶ 26. Fraud to invalidate a marriage must be such as negatives consent, without reference to previous inducement, and must be nearly, if not quite, coincident in time with the marriage.—Leavitt v. Leavitt, 13 Mich. 452.

¶ 27. Chastity is not a requisite to the validity of a marriage, nor does mere incontinence avoid a subsequent marriage.—Leavitt v. Leavitt, 13 Mich. 452.

¶ 28. Whether pregnancy by another than the prospective husband and unknown to him would avoid marriage, quære.—Sissung v. Sissung, 65 Mich. 168, the court being equally divided.

¶ 29. Ante-nuptial unchastity of a woman is not sufficient ground for the annulment of a marriage, where the complainant had also been intimate with her previous thereto. (Affirmed by equally divided court.)—Sylvester v. Sylvester, 180 Mich. 512.

Evidence of ceremony as bearing on nature of subsequent cohabitation, see post ¶ 62.

¶ 30. Where parties are married one of whom is under and the other over the age of consent, the latter, by the statutes of this state, is bound by the marriage, unless they separate by consent before the other reaches lawful age, and do not cohabit afterwards, or unless the other refuses to consent on arriving at that age.—People v. Slack, 15 Mich. 193.

¶ 31. The performance of a marriage which takes place four days before the filing of a decree of divorce, in favor of one of the parties to the marriage ceremony, is not invalid where the parties married continue to live and cohabit together as husband and wife from that time forward.—People v. Booth, 121 Mich. 131.

¶ 31a. The rule, that cohabitation as husband and wife meretricious in its beginning will not be held to be marriage after disability to contract marriage is removed without some further act or agreement of the parties equivalent in law to marriage, will not be applied in a case where the court is not convinced that the marriage of parties was unlawful in the beginning.—Bechtel v. Barton, 147 Mich. 318.

General law of actual fraud, see Fraud.

¶ 32. An action for fraud and deceit lies for fraudulently inducing a woman to enter into the marriage relation.—Sears v. Wegner, 150 Mich. 388.

¶ 33. Where, in an action for fraudulently inducing plaintiff to enter into the marriage relation, it appears that defendant told plaintiff that he was already married, but such marriage was void, and promised that shortly he would have such marriage set aside and have a formal public marriage with plaintiff solemnized, and by means of such promises induced plaintiff to enter into formal exchange of promises which he represented would constitute and stand as a marriage until the void marriage was set aside, and also induced plaintiff to live with him as his wife, plaintiff is entitled to recover if she proves that she entered into the relation in the belief that defendant's former marriage was void.—Sears v. Wegner, 150 Mich. 388.

III. EVIDENCE AND PROOFS AND ESTOPPEL.

Evidence of nonassent against presumption of validity, see post ¶ 50.

General law of presumptions and burden, see Evidence, II; Indictment, VIII, A.

Presumption as to foreign marriage laws, see Evidence § 59.

¶ 34. A formal ceremony of marriage, whether in due form or not, must be presumed to be by consent, and therefore, prima facie, a contract of marriage per verba de presenti.—Hutchins v. Kimmell, 31 Mich. 126.

¶ 35. Evidence that persons appeared at a church, where the officiating minister publicly and in the presence of others performed a ceremony of marriage between them, and that they seemed to regard themselves as married, raises a presumption, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the ceremony was regular and legal, though there be no proof of the particulars of the ceremony or of the specific requisites of a lawful marriage ceremony under the forms and usages or customs of such church.—People v. Calder, 30 Mich. 85.

¶ 36. Reputation is important as evidence to establish the fact of a marriage, but it cannot disprove an actual marriage. And where there is doubt, the presumption should favor a lawful marriage rather than notorious immorality.—Peet v. Peet, 52 Mich. 464.

¶ 37. Proof that a man and woman went to Canada and there agreed in the presence of a person whom the woman took to be a minister, but who was not in fact such, to take each other as man and wife, and that they thereafter cohabited as such, would be sufficient in Michigan to establish a marriage valid at the common law, and, in the absence of evidence to the contrary must be presumed to constitute a valid marriage under the laws of Canada; and proof of additional positive requirements of the Canadian law would not by itself defeat such presumption, but noncompliance therewith must be shown. Nor would such presumption be rebutted by the man's subsequent assertion that the marriage was a mere sham.—People v. Loomis, 106 Mich. 250.

¶ 38. Where a marriage ceremony is proved to have been performed in compliance with the provisions of Laws 1897, Act No. 180, authorizing secret marriages to protect reputation and requiring consent of parents or guardians, regularity and legality are presumed, and this presumption is not overcome by the fact that the girl's stepfather did not give his consent to the marriage, he not being her natural guardian.—People v. Schoonmaker, 117 Mich. 190.

¶ 39. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, it is presumed that parties during the continuance of a marriage, sustained the usual relations of husband and wife.—Killackey v. Killackey, 156 Mich. 127.

¶ 40. The fact that a party to a marriage has previously married someone else does not, in the absence of any evidence as to the continuance or termination of such prior marriage, impeach the presumption of legality attaching to the second marriage.—Killackey v. Killackey, 156 Mich. 127.

Provisions as to admissibility of original certificates and records of marriage as evidence, see Comp. L. 1915, § 11375.

¶ 41. The law is very liberal in the admission of evidence concerning marriage and it may be shown by testimony of the widow herself, especially when supported by a child and neighbors.—Shotwell v. Harrison, 22 Mich. 410.

¶ 42. In proceedings to recover dower, marriage is provable by conduct and reputation.—Proctor v. Bigelow, 88 Mich. 282.

¶ 43. In a prosecution for adultery, a marriage certificate is admissible, when accompanied by proof of the identity of the parties.—People v. Isham, 109 Mich. 72.

¶ 44. A foreign certificate of marriage is inadmissible to prove marriage.—People v. Imes, 110 Mich. 250.

¶ 45. A woman's deposition that she is the widow of a man who is deceased, and wherein she says he was her husband, is testimony that they were married.—Shotwell v. Harrison, 22 Mich. 410.

¶ 46. Certificates that are sufficient to prove the performance of a ceremony of marriage in a foreign country prima facie establish the marriage, and it is not error to admit such certificates in evidence without proof of the foreign law.—Hutchins v. Kimmell, 31 Mich. 126.

¶ 47. A certificate of marriage performed in another state, merely signed by the minister, is not evidence in a criminal case where the defendant is entitled to confront the witnesses.—People v. Lambert, 5 Mich. 349.

¶ 48. In a prosecution for adultery with a married woman the recorded marriage certificate is admissible to aid in proving the marriage, though it may be insufficient without some identification of the parties. But where the husband's testimony and the certificate together identify them, and the defendant admits the fact, an objection to the admission of the certificate becomes unimportant.—People v. Broughton, 49 Mich. 339.

¶ 49. A certified copy of a decree of divorce from bed and board is evidence of marriage as between the parties and their privies.—Killackey v. Killackey, 156 Mich. 127.

Insufficiency of confession to prove marriage in prosecution for bigamy, see Indictment § 314.
Sufficiency of evidence of marriage as factor in proof of heirship, see also Descent ¶ 9.

¶ 50. Positive evidence of nonassent to a marriage ceremony that had been irregularly performed weighs against the presumption of its validity.—Kopke v. People, 43 Mich. 41.

¶ 51. On a criminal trial a woman, upon her voir dire, testified that she was married to one P. in 1859; that the last time she saw him was in April, 1860; that she had not heard from him since; that in 1862 she read an account in a newspaper of the death of a man by the name of P., whom she supposed to be her husband; that when she married defendant she told him her husband was dead, and had been dead several years, and that she had lived with defendant as his wife about three years up to the time of his arrest. Held, that the evidence made a strong prima facie case of a marriage in good faith.—Dixon v. People, 18 Mich. 84.

¶ 52. In the absence of opposing testimony or of suspicious circumstances, marriage was regarded as proved by the depositions of his widow and neighbors, there being no question of identity or of his death.—Shotwell v. Harrison, 22 Mich. 410.

¶ 53. Marriage is provable by conduct and reputation in all civil cases involving property rights, but not in criminal cases or in actions for criminal conversation.—Proctor v. Bigelow, 38 Mich. 282; Perry v. Lovejoy, 49 Mich. 529.

¶ 54. In an action by a husband for enticing away his wife, evidence of cohabitation and repute and of defendant's admissions of the fact are enough to establish the marriage relation.—Perry v. Lovejoy, 49 Mich. 529.

¶ 55. In an action by a married woman for slander her marriage may be proved by repute. The highest evidence of marriage is not required where that fact is not a part of the main issue.—Leonard v. Pope, 27 Mich. 145.

¶ 56. In proving marriage reputation is important only as circumstantial evidence as to whether the parties themselves regarded each other as man and wife. An intimacy between a man and his housekeeper is not of itself evidence that they are married. And so long as their relations are such that the fact of marriage continues to be seriously questioned, it cannot be considered as established by reputation.—Cross v. Cross, 55 Mich. 280.

¶ 57. As it is possible for a valid marriage to be shown with no means of showing its time and place (and this is especially true of marriages in distant places), a witness who swears to seeing a man and woman joined together by a marriage ceremony, performed seriously by a person acting in a clerical or magisterial character, testifies to what is a valid marriage, unless clearly illegal by statute.—People v. Perriman, 72 Mich. 184.

¶ 58. The continued affirmance of the marriage relation between a man and woman living together during the life and after the death of one who was alleged to be the woman's legal husband, the later separation and settlement of property rights, divorce proceedings, and reference in the will of the husband to "my wife" are circumstances pointing strongly to a marriage between the parties; and they are not overcome by her testimony that her first husband was living when the cohabitation began.—Bechtel v. Barton, 147 Mich. 318.

See also ante ¶¶ 11, 14, 16.
Sufficiency of nonceremonial marriage, see ante § 3.

¶ 59. To establish a nonceremonial marriage, there must be proof, not only of the agreement, but of the setting up of the relation of husband and wife by cohabitation, and the parties must act in conformity with such agreement and live together and cohabit as husband and wife.—People v. Spencer, 199 Mich. 395.

¶ 60. Prima facie, a good marriage is shown by proof of a present agreement followed by cohabitation; it will not be presumed, in the absence of proof, that there are regulations anywhere restrictive of this common right.—Hutchins v. Kimmell, 31 Mich. 126.

¶ 61. A marriage is presumed to exist where for seven years after the legal impediments of a former marriage, if any existed, had been removed the parties lived and cohabited together, introduced each other as husband and wife, the husband applied for insurance and named and designated his alleged wife as beneficiary, the wife supported the husband during several years' illness, and no question of the validity of the marriage was raised until after the husband's death.—Barker v. Valentine, 125 Mich. 336.

¶ 62. Pending a suit by a wife for divorce, she married again, and, after securing a decree, lived and cohabited with the second husband as his wife, under the belief that another marriage ceremony was not necessary, induced by his statement that he had been so advised by good counsel, and his agreement, which was kept, to make his will in her favor, and deliver it to her for safekeeping. Held, that the formal marriage ceremony may be treated as evidence, with what subsequently occurred, of the nature of the relation which the parties assumed and occupied, and that the facts establish a valid marriage.—Williams v. Kilburn, 88 Mich. 279.

¶ 63. Where a man cohabited with a woman who was married to another, and who, after obtaining a divorce, asked him to marry her, which he refused to do, an actual marriage cannot be presumed from their continuing to live together.—Rose v. Rose, 67 Mich. 619.

¶ 64. Where the evidence showed that no marriage ceremony had ever been performed, and that the parties, though living as husband and wife and passing in society as such, had several times stated that they were not married,—the woman having on one occasion made affidavit to that effect,—a divorce was denied on the ground that there was no marriage.—Van Dusan v. Van Dusan, 97 Mich. 70.

¶ 65. On a petition by an administrator to obtain an order of the probate court, determining the heirs of decedent, evidence held insufficient to establish a common law marriage between decedent and one claiming his estate as his widow.—People v. Spencer, 199 Mich. 395.

¶ 66. On a bill to affirm a common law marriage under Comp. L. 1897, § 8619, testimony of the complainant to the effect that defendant requested her to come to his house and after his mother left they would get married and she did come and continued staying there with him, and on her frequent requests to have the ceremony performed he would put her off, that supposing she was going to be his wife she continued living with him for ten years, performing the duties of a wife although she knew it was a breach in etiquette, but she supposed he would keep his word, while it establishes a promise of marriage, a breach of that promise and seduction, does not establish a common law marriage.—Judson v. Judson, 147 Mich. 518.

¶ 67. Where after the performance of a marriage ceremony in 1885, the parties lived together for eight years before the woman learned that the man, who she knew had previously been married but who had told her that he was divorced, had in fact never been divorced until 1893, and where after obtaining such knowledge she insisted on a new marriage ceremony but was informed by the man that this would create scandal and was unnecessary and that they would treat the former marriage as binding, and where thereafter they continued to live together as husband and wife for three years; an agreement existed to take each other as man and wife, and constituted a valid marriage.—Flanagan v. Flanagan, 122 Mich. 386.

¶ 68. Evidence that a man and woman after living together illicitly for a time mutually agreed to live henceforward as husband and wife and so held themselves out to their neighbors is sufficient to submit to the jury the question as to the existence of a common law marriage, although the woman up to the time of the alleged marriage used her maiden name and not long before the death of the decedent took a deed in that name and signed a conveyance, and the decedent described himself as a bachelor in various conveyances.—Lorimer v. Lorimer, 124 Mich. 631.

¶ 69. The rule in Pennsylvania regarding marriages not performed strictly in accordance with the statute is the same as that laid down in this state, namely, that proof of such an informal marriage must be supplemented by proof of cohabitation.—People v. McQuaid, 85 Mich. 123.

¶ 70. Complainant, a blind and somewhat deaf old man, who had just received a liberal pension with a large amount of arrears, was induced, by putting him under the influence of liquors, to marry defendant, who was less than half his age, and who had a young child. Marriage annulled for fraud.—Gillett v. Gillett, 78 Mich. 184.

¶ 71. The wife's ante-nuptial pregnancy by a third person concealed from the husband and resulting in delivery of matured child six months after marriage warrants annulment of marriage on ground of fraud.—Harrison v. Harrison, 94 Mich. 559.

¶ 72. On appeal from a dismissal of cross complaints in a divorce case, in which the wife has alleged extreme cruelty on the husband's part in forcing her to sign a confession of unchastity and the husband has alleged specifically the matter confessed, the marriage may be annulled for fraud practiced on the husband, the wife's written confession of ante-nuptial unchastity, and of the husband's nonpaternity of a child born seven months after marriage, being considered as voluntary and truthful.—Nadra v. Nadra, 79 Mich. 591.

¶ 73. In a suit for divorce by the wife the defense that the marriage is invalid because the wife had a husband living at the time of the marriage is not sustained by evidence that the complainant's first husband after living with her for 15 months without unpleasantness left her to make a home for them in another State, that he was ill at the time, that on due inquiry he was never found but reported ill and about to return home, and never returned, that after four years the complainant and the defendant were married and had lived together more than ten years, and that nothing had ever been heard of the previous husband.—Wagoner v. Wagoner, 128 Mich. 685.

¶¶ 74, 75. Where one has been appointed administratrix as decedent's widow, the legality of her marriage cannot be questioned in an action by her as such administratrix.—James v. Emmet Min. Co., 55 Mich. 335.

¶ 76. A woman who by mutual agreement with the man with whom she was living had parted from and released all claims upon him and left the state and married another man cannot maintain a claim for widow's allowances against the estate of her original companion, as against a woman who in good faith lawfully married him, without, at least, showing very clearly that she, the claimant, had been his lawful wife.—Young's Appeal, 52 Mich. 592.

Cohabitation after attaining majority as bar to annulment, see Comp. L. 1915, § 11422.
Cohabitation after force or fraud as bar to annulment, see Comp. L. 1915, § 11425.
Attained age of consent at time of marriage as bar to annulment, see Comp. L. 1915, § 11422.

¶ 77. To warrant the annulling of a marriage for defendant's fraud in concealing her pregnancy, complainant must establish by satisfactory evidence that he was deceived; and he must, therefore, negative any legal inference that he knew, or had reasonable ground to believe, what her condition was.—Dawson v. Dawson, 18 Mich. 335.

¶ 78. Fraud, to warrant the annulment of a marriage, must usually be such as negatives any consent to be married, without reference to previous inducement, and it must be nearly, if not absolutely, coincident in time with the marriage. The wife's ante-nuptial incontinence (where there was no actual pregnancy by another at the time of the marriage), whether concealed by falsehood or simply not referred to at all, is not a ground for annulling the marriage.—Leavitt v. Leavitt, 13 Mich. 452.

¶ 79. A bill was brought by a husband, some-twenty years after marriage, to procure a decree of nullity on the ground of fraud in the marriage contract, and the bill alleged that the defendant was guilty of ante-nuptial unchastity; that her chastity was made the subject of frequent and diligent inquiry by him before marriage, and that the defendant made specific and open assertions to him on the subject, upon the falsehood of which, and his own inability to ascertain anything on the subject, he based his sole claim to relief. Several children had been born to the parties, and no complaint was made of defendant's conduct during the coverture. Bill dismissed.—Leavitt v. Leavitt, 13 Mich. 452.

¶ 80. By an equally divided court a decree was affirmed annulling for fraud a marriage procured by the woman's representing to the man (with whom she had had intercourse) that she was pregnant by him, she knowing that she was pregnant by another.—Sissung v. Sissung, 65 Mich. 168.

¶ 81. A bill to annul a marriage for gross duress was sustained where the marriage had never been recognized, and complainant was an unsophisticated youth of eighteen whom defendant had brought before a justice on a charge of bastardy, and who, though protesting his innocence, had been frightened by the justice into a marriage on the spot.—Smith v. Smith, 51 Mich. 607.

¶ 82. To warrant annulling a marriage for fraud there should be satisfactory evidence sustaining the charge, irrespective of the declarations, confessions or admissions of the parties.—Dawson v. Dawson, 18 Mich. 335.

¶ 83. To give the courts of any state jurisdiction of the marriage relation, one of the parties must be domiciled within that state.—People v. Dawell, 25 Mich. 247.

¶ 84. Comp. L. 1871, § 5068 (How. St. § 6622), in requiring the issues raised upon a bill to annul a marriage to be tried by jury is not mandatory, but secures to either party the right to a jury unless it is waived. Failure after replication to move for a feigned issue is a waiver.—Schafberg v. Schafberg, 52 Mich. 429.

¶ 85. The verdict contemplated by How. St. § 6622 to be given by the jury that tries an issue upon the legality of a marriage, is merely advisory, and does not bind the court.—Maier v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 112 Mich. 491.

¶ 86. The guardian of an infant defendant in a bill to annul a marriage cannot bind her by his admission that she procured the marriage by fraud.—Cooper v. Mayhew, 40 Mich. 528.

Alimony in divorce cases, see Divorce.
Decree of custody and for maintenance of children on annulling marriage, see Comp. L. 1915, § 11426.
Effect of annulment decree on legitimacy of children, see Comp. L. 1915, §§ 11419, 11420.
Mode and term for hearing on bill confessed, see 1916 C. C. Rule 59, § 3.

¶ 87. In a suit in equity to annul a marriage, the circuit court has discretionary authority, under How. St. § 6622, providing that all issues upon the legality of marriages (except where physical capacity is involved) shall be tried by jury, to grant an application for the submission to a jury of the question whether complainant was mentally competent to enter into the marriage contract, even though the suit has been several times noticed for hearing by the party making the application, and none of the prior notices have mentioned a jury trial; but the statute is not mandatory and under such circumstances the circuit court may properly deny the application on the ground of waiver.—Maier v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 112 Mich. 491.

¶ 88. On a bill to annul a marriage under Comp. L. 1897, § 8618, the court has jurisdiction to make an order for expenses of defendant in defending the suit even though there is no express statutory authority therefor, inasmuch as the power to grant allowance is incident to divorce cases.—Webb v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 144 Mich. 674.

MARSHALLING ASSETS AND SECURITIES.

TREATS of the equitable principle of so ordering recourse of creditors to assets and securities that the assets shall be applied with due regard to the equities of all and the securities shall be classified in order that those doubly secured may not exhaust them at the expense of those who have but one fund to look to.

Analysis.

§ 2. Occasions and grounds.
§ 3. Order in which to sell or subject assets.

---

Grounds and occasion for marshalling, see post § 2.
Order for sale of assets, see post § 3.

¶ 1. The rule of marshalling assets must be applied so as to protect and not destroy equities.—Southworth v. Parker, 41 Mich. 198.

¶ 2. The doctrine of marshalling assets must not be applied to the mortgagee's injury; its purpose is to protect as far as possible later interests.—Detroit Savings Bank v. Truesdail, 38 Mich. 430.

Marshalling under assignments, see Assignments for Creditors § 25.
Marshalling claims for satisfaction out of chattel mortgaged property, see also Chattel Mortgages ¶ 349.
Marshalling assets in insolvent corporate estates, see Corporations § 226.
Marshalling assets in distribution, see Estates of Decedents ¶ 1199.

¶ 3. Where two persons have a lien on the same piece of property, which is not sufficient to satisfy both, and one of them has a lien for his debt on another piece of property, he must exhaust the latter before resorting to the common fund.—Trowbridge v. Harleston, W. 185; Cooper v. Bigly, 13 Mich. 463; Southworth v. Parker, 41 Mich. 198.

¶ 4. The rule that when one of two creditors of a common debtor has two funds out of which to pay he is first to resort to the fund upon which the other creditor has no lien does not apply where one creditor has recourse to an indorser as well as to the common debtor.—Southern Michigan Nat. Bank v. Byles, 67 Mich. 296.

¶ 5. The creditor of a corporation for fuel furnished to the corporation on the oral promise of its president to pay for it, if the creditor would keep on supplying such fuel, is not required for the benefit of other creditors to look first to the president and to release a levy on corporate chattels for the debt; since that would relegate the creditor to the insecurity of relying on a promise not enforceable for want of a writing.—Ramsdell v. Citizens' Electric Light & Power Co., 103 Mich. 89.

¶ 6. Where lands conveyed by a husband to his wife are by her mortgaged to secure his debt, he at the same time turning over to the creditor notes as collateral security and giving a chattel mortgage, the other securities should be exhausted before resorting to the wife's land.—Grand Rapids Savings Bank v. Denison, 92 Mich. 418.

¶ 7. A doubly secured mortgagee, even if marshalling is otherwise proper, will not be required to resort to a foreign mortgage subsequently given and not shown to be available with equal security and without prejudice to his rights.—Farwell v. Bigelow, 112 Mich. 285.

¶ 8. The rule, that the holder of a lien upon two funds must, for the accommodation of a lien holder as to but one of these, enforce his lien against the other, is not universally applicable, and it can seldom be just where, instead of a common debtor, there are two or more whose interests in the funds are different.—Southworth v. Parker, 41 Mich. 198.

¶ 9. The doctrine will not enable a third mortgagee of part of premises covered by the first mortgage to compel the first mortgagee to sell first a parcel on which he also holds a second encumbrance, which is not included in the third.—Slater v. Breese, 36 Mich. 77.

§ 3. Order in which to sell or subject assets.

Selling in inverse order of alienation to marshal assets in equity foreclosure, see Foreclosure § 116.

Persons entitled to require sale to be made in inverse order of alienation to marshal assets, see Foreclosure § 117.

Selling on foreclosure in inverse order of alienation to marshal assets, see Foreclosure §§ 116-117.

Persons entitled to require sale on foreclosure in inverse order of alienation, see Foreclosure § 117.

Equity jurisdiction to direct lands of estate to be sold in inverse ratio of alienation by devisees, see Estates of Decedents ¶ 817.

Order in which diverse debts should be satisfied out of common fund, see Payment, III.

Right of pledgee to sue on debt without resort to pledge, see Pledges, § 9.

Statutory order of contribution of lands liable to execution, see Jud. Act, chap. XXIII, § 132; Comp. L. 1915, § 12947.

¶ 10. As a general rule, where mortgaged lands are alienated or encumbered in parcels, the parcels are to be charged for the satisfaction of the mortgage in the inverse order of alienation or encumbrance.—Cooper v. Bigly, 13 Mich. 463; Ireland v. Woolman, 15 Mich. 253; McKinney v. Miller, 19 Mich. 142; Sibley v. Baker, 23 Mich. 312; Sager v. Tupper, 35 Mich. 134; McVeigh v. Sherwood, 47 Mich. 545.

¶ 11. The grantee of a parcel of mortgaged land is entitled to have the rest of the land sold to satisfy the mortgage before resort is had to his.—Mason v. Payne, W. 459; Gantz v. Toles, 40 Mich. 725.

¶ 12. Subsequent purchasers or encumbrancers take subject to any explicit provisions of a mortgage as to the order in which the property shall be sold, and that without reference to the considerations on which such preferences were agreed on.—Mickle v. Maxfield, 42 Mich. 304.

¶ 13. A junior mortgagee cannot claim that a homestead covered by the first mortgage but not by his own shall be first sold by the prior mortgagee.—Armitage v. Toll, 64 Mich. 412.

¶ 14. Where A. had a mortgage upon lots one, two and three, and B. had a subsequent mortgage upon lot three, and they, having no knowledge of conveyances which had been made of lots one and two subsequently to their mortgages, conjointly released a part of lot three, it was held that B.'s equitable right to have lots one and two first sold was not thereby affected.—Cooper v. Bigly, 13 Mich. 463.

¶ 15. On March 2, 1905, Warner mortgaged four tracts of land for $6,000. On January 25, 1906, he conveyed one of these tracts to Jewett, subject to the mortgage for $6,000, which the latter assumed. This deed recited that the mortgage was "to be paid on or before five years from date, March 2, 1905. * * * All interest to be paid to March 2, 1906." Later Jewett conveyed the land, subject to the mortgage, the amount of which was deducted from the purchase price, to Freeman, who relied solely on Warner's deed to Jewett, in corroboration of Jewett's statements as to the terms of the mortgage. The statements therein, which appear above, were untrue, for in fact the mortgage was payable in yearly instalments, and the whole became due upon failure to pay the interest. Jewett's deed to Freeman recited that the interest was paid to March 2, 1906. The interest was not in fact paid, nor was the first instalment. Held, in a foreclosure suit by the mortgagee, who elected to declare the entire amount due, that Freeman had no right to rely upon the description of the mortgage in Warner's deed, and therefore was not entitled to have the other tracts first sold in payment of the mortgage debt.—Pease v. Warner, 153 Mich. 140. (Grant, C. J., and Montgomery, J., dissenting.)

¶ 16. C. gave F. a warranty deed of a farm subject to payment by F. of a certain mortgage. Another mortgage given to secure a debt of C.'s covered the farm and some of Mrs. C.'s property, and this mortgage was not excepted from the warranty. Upon the foreclosure of the last mentioned mortgage, Mrs. C.'s property was bid off first and bought in by F. Held, that as to her own lands she was entitled to the rights of a surety, and could insist that the farm be sold first; that her release of dower rights in the farm gave her the right to insist that F. protect her by paying off the mortgage first named; and that as between herself and him the foreclosure sale was wrongful, and F. acquired no rights by it except the right to the mortgage.—Carley v. Fox, 38 Mich. 387.

General law of chancery practice, see Equity.
Method of claiming benefit of doctrine of marshalling assets in foreclosure, see Foreclosure ¶ 314.

¶ 17. In order to have a proper marshalling, the purchaser of land at a foreclosure sale may file a bill to compel the foreclosure of a prior mortgage upon that and other property, and to have the other property first sold; and if, pending the suit, the prior mortgagee purchases the interest of the complainant, he may file an original bill, in the nature of a supplemental bill, setting up the change of title, and is entitled to the same relief that could have been had under the original bill.—Cooper v. Bigly, 13 Mich. 463.

¶ 18. A third encumbrancer who concedes the existence of a second encumbrance is not of right entitled to introduce proofs to show that the amount of the second encumbrance is less than it is represented to be, where the question is merely as to the order of sale on foreclosure of the first mortgage, as between the parcels covered by the third and that covered by the second encumbrance.—Slater v. Breese, 36 Mich. 77.

V. Interference with relation or service by third persons.

[Note. The volume of matter in this topic pertaining to the common law and statutory tort liability of the master for personal injuries to the servant in course of his employment is very large. Much of this excepting that under the Federal Employers' Liability Act is to a greater or less degree superseded by the liability under the Workmen's Compensation Act. In the future, therefore, it is likely that the number of cases to be digested under division III of Master and Servant will be relatively small. Accordingly while the editor has not ventured to omit or discard any case as obsolete, it has seemed proper to devise an analytical index capable of simplification and contraction, which has been done by denoting with letters added to the figures such section lines as describe mere details and variations of the general rule or principle of law. It is not expected that these lettered sections will appear in the periodical digests supplementary of this.

Thus sections 55-55q, post, treat of the fellow servant doctrine in its varying aspects, but sections 55a to 55q inclusive are of a subordinate grade and not likely to be permanently needed.

For reasons just stated it has not seemed necessary or advisable to provide in division III such numerous and detailed cross-references as in the more thoroughly live and active topics. Enough have been made, however, to adequately connect all related and complementary portions of the digest.

Even those cases which might be regarded as obsolete precedents on the subject of employers' liability may yet be of value as precedents on the general law of actionable negligence. For that reason alone it would be unsafe to omit any.]

I. THE RELATION; FORMATION, DURATION AND TERMINATION.

Employer or employee of party as juryman, see Jury, § 24.

Creation of relation, see post § 5.
Mutual contract rights and liabilities, see post § 7 et seq.
Contract to furnish information as to specified lands as one of employment, see post ¶ 36.
Evidence as to existence of contract of employment, see post §§ 21, 28, 64a, 65a, 79.
Jury questions as to existence of relation, see post §§ 30, 67, 80.
Relation of wrongdoer as servant of defendant, see also post § 74.
Relation of injured party as servant of defendant, see post §§ 34, 64a, 65a, 67a.
Interference with relation by third persons, see post § 82.
Distinguished from independent contractor, see post § 2.
Agency and service as compatible relations, see Agency § 2, ¶ 9.
Master and apprentice, see Apprentices.

¶ 1. Although in all ordinary transactions the relation of contractor excludes that of master and servant, yet there is no such repugnance between them that they cannot coexist.—City of Detroit v. Corey, 9 Mich. 165.

¶ 2. The relation of master and servant may exist between a corporation and an individual.—McWilliams v. Detroit Central Mills Co., 31 Mich. 274.

Negligent employee as servant of defendant or of independent contractor, see post § 74.
Independent contractors distinguished from servants, see also Independent Contractors § 1.

¶ 3. One whom the employer does not control and has no right to control, as to the method, or means, by which he produces the result contracted for, is an independent contractor.—Gall v. Detroit Journal Co., 191 Mich. 405.

¶ 3a. One employed to furnish labor and materials for a job at a fixed price is an independent contractor and not a servant of the employer.—Bacon v. Candler, 181 Mich. 372.

¶ 4. It is not the fact of actual interference with the control, but the right to interfere, that makes the difference between an independent contractor and a servant.—Tuttle v. Embury-Martin Lumber Co., 192 Mich. 385; Opitz v. Hoertz, 194 Mich. 626.

¶ 4a. Workmen employed by the day in construction of a building and under the superintendence of the owner's architect are servants of the owner and not independent contractors.—Hoar v. Merritt, 62 Mich. 386.

¶ 5. The posting of a notice in the mailing room of a newspaper company requiring delivery men not to exceed the speed limit fixed by law in making delivery of newspapers does not constitute the assumption of control over one who has a contract for delivery of newspapers in his own conveyance so as to create the relation of master and servant instead of that of independent contractor.—Gall v. Detroit Journal Co., 191 Mich. 405.

¶ 6. The relation of independent contractor exists where a person who is not a licensed drayman, enters into a written contract with a newspaper company whereby he agrees in consideration of a certain weekly salary, subject to deduction of fines for delay in delivery, to deliver and distribute to such persons and at such places and along such routes and on such regular schedules as may from time to time be designated by the company, such delivery to be according to means of conveyance selected and controlled by him and without supervision by the newspaper company, even though either party has the right to terminate the contract at pleasure.—Gall v. Detroit Journal Co., 191 Mich. 405.

¶ 7. A written proposition by a contractor to the owner of land for clearing a tract of property destroyed by fire and erection of new buildings, which is plain and unambiguous, but is the entire contract between the parties upon acceptance, must determine as to whether the relation between the parties is that of master and servant or whether the contractor is an independent contractor.—Opitz v. Hoertz, 194 Mich. 626.

¶ 8. Plaintiff and some other miners were engaged in mining shale in defendant's mine. They were to be paid thirty cents a ton, the money to be divided between them. They furnished their own lights and explosives and were masters of their own time. Defendant furnished cars, track, and a place to work, and an agent of defendant handled and exploded the dynamite. Defendant could discharge them at any time. Held, plaintiff was a servant, not an independent contractor.—Lewis v. Detroit Vitrified Brick Co., 164 Mich. 489.

¶ 8a. A construction company which agreed to construct a telephone plant and system for a telephone company and to assume all risks connected therewith, held to be a servant of the telephone company and not an independent contractor.—Larson v. Home Tel. Co., 164 Mich. 295.

¶ 9. The relation of owner and independent contractor exists under a contract for the clearing of the site of a building and the erection of a new building, according to the terms of which the contractor agrees to superintend the work of clearing the site and erecting the new building, to co-operate with the employer in purchasing material and in employing men and teams, to furnish necessary tools to properly carry on the work, to do the work in accordance with the wishes of the employer and to accept in compensation therefor, a stipulated per cent of the net cost of labor and materials.—Opitz v. Hoertz, 194 Mich. 626.

¶ 10. In an action by a railroad employee to recover for personal injuries sustained as the result of the starting of the machinery in a coal dock used for loading coal in engines while plaintiff was in the hopper for purpose of spreading out the coal, where it appeared that the foreman in charge, in addition to his duties as yard foreman had a contract with the company for loading coal and hired and paid plaintiff, evidence held insufficient to show that such foreman was an independent contractor.—Guy v. Cincinnati Northern R. Co., 198 Mich. 140.

¶ 11. One who furnishes an estimate of the cost of the construction of a reinforced concrete building and agrees to oversee the work for a certain percentage of the cost, subject to certain modifications, according to whether the cost exceeds or is less than the estimate to furnish equipment and machinery and to pay for the hauling of the same away when the work is completed, and is to have the lumber used in the work, is an independent contractor.—Bayne v. Everham, 197 Mich. 181.

Joint adventure defined and distinguished from employment for share of profits, see Joint Adventures § 1.

¶ 12. One who is to enter land, in the name of the others to an agreement by which they are to advance money for his expenses, and on repayment to deed to him a portion of the land, is a joint adventurer with them and not their servant.—McCreery v. Green, 38 Mich. 172.

§ 4. Servantship for one or the other of several persons.

Servant employed from other employer's force as independent contractors, see Independent Contractors § 3.

¶ 13. Where men are employed in the ordinary way as laborers in cutting trees for another person under an intermediate agent who is an overseer and not a contractor, they as well as such agent are the servants of such other person.—Smith v. Webster, 23 Mich. 298.

¶ 14. A contract for services wherein one party reserves the right to pay the other's laborers in order to secure himself against the risk of non-performance does not make the party reserving such a right the employer of the laborers or exonerate the other party from paying them himself. The payments are made by virtue of an agency, and on the employer's account.—Dyer v. Tyler, 49 Mich. 366.

¶ 15. The driver supplied by a bailee of a team is the servant of the bailee and not of the owner where such arrangement is made temporarily in place of the original agreement that the owner furnish the driver for the team.—Hofer v. Hodge, 52 Mich. 372.

¶ 16. Men employed in a logging camp by the owner's agent and upon the owner's credit are the servants of the owner.—Smaltz v. Boyce, 109 Mich. 382.

¶ 17. On the issue whether the chief engineer in making a contract for construction acted as agent for defendant, the fact that defendant railroad company was engaged in procuring aid and rights of way has no tendency to show that it was building its own road, or that any particular person employed in that work was doing so as a servant of defendant where no adequate authority is shown.—Bond v. Pontiac, O. & P. A. R. Co., 62 Mich. 643.

Rights and liabilities under the contract, see post § 7 et seq.

Life contracts, see post § 18.

¶ 18. A contract is not void for indefiniteness where the term of employment, the compensation, and the duties to be performed are specified.—Carney v. Ionia Transp. Co., 157 Mich. 54.

Servant's right to occupy house after quitting service of master, see post ¶ 67.
Discharge, dismissal or breach of contract, see post § 17.
Actions for wrongful discharge, see post § 19.
Presumption as to continuation of the employment for another like period, see post § 20.

¶ 19. The service tie or contractual relation and obligation between master and servant is not broken by suspension of all activities directly beneficial to the employer, as by noon intermission for lunch.—Haller v. City of Lansing, 195 Mich. 753.

¶ 20. A employer's agreement, in consideration of his employee's compromising a claim for personal injuries, to retain the latter in his service for life, is not terminated by the employee's resigning to accept another position, which he held for a few months, and, becoming dissatisfied, returns to his original employment, where it was agreed by the employer's superintendent, with whom the employee was required to deal, before the resignation was accepted, that, if he did not like the new place, he could have his old one again upon the same conditions that existed before he left it.—Stearns v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 112 Mich. 651.

II. MUTUAL CONTRACT RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES; COMPENSATION.

Compensation and reimbursement between agent and principal, see Agency, IV, B.
Immateriality of evidence as to unsatisfactory general employment in action for extra services, see Contracts ¶ 1285.

Validity of parol promise of employer to pay employee's board, see Frauds, Statute of, § 14.
Validity of parol promise to pay for services inuring to another, see Frauds, Statute of, § 22 and ¶ 111.

¶ 21. When an express contract covers the terms of an employment there is no room for implications which change, or defeat, those terms.—Hollister v. Kinyon's Estate, 195 Mich. 261.

¶ 22. The use, in negotiations for employment, of the word "salary," as implying a year's compensation, cannot be said in itself to fix the time of employment at a year rather than a term of years.—Palmer v. Marquette & P. Rolling Mill Co., 32 Mich. 274.

¶ 23. A contract of hire made June 2, 1890, and which recites that the employee is to receive a certain sum per week, and "for the year 1891 the above-mentioned salary and five per cent of the net profits of" the business, covers the whole of the year 1891.—Koehler v. Buhl, 94 Mich. 496.

¶ 24. Plaintiff wrote a third party offering to work for the latter as an engraver at $37.50 a week, with the understanding that at the end of six months he was to receive $40 per week. Said party replied, agreeing to pay $37.50 per week for six months and $40 a week thereafter if he found plaintiff was making good. Held, said contract of employment was for six months and not for a year.—Robinson v. Western U. Tel. Co., 169 Mich. 503.

¶ 25. A written contract of employment as a "general superintendent" is not so ambiguous as to the purposes of employment as to render the contract void, and if the term is deemed at all ambiguous when used in connection with the kind of business defendant was engaged in, it may be explained, but the parties must be deemed to have used it in the sense in which it would be understood by those engaged in that business.—Schaub v. Arc Welding Co., 123 Mich. 487.

¶ 26. A "spare brakeman" employed as needed, having been injured and having contracted with the railroad company for re-employment is entitled to employment only as needed.—Sax v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 129 Mich. 502.

¶ 27. The term "re-employment" in a contract between a railroad company and an injured employee means employment in the same service as that in which he was formerly employed.—Sax v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 129 Mich. 502.

¶ 28. Where an employee of a railroad, given a contract for life in consideration of settlement of a claim for injuries, desired to take up other employment and did so on the assurance of his superior, the division superintendent, that he could have his place back if the new one proved unsatisfactory, which occurred; the authority of the superintendent to make a new contract upon the same terms as the original is not involved, his engagement being equivalent to granting the employee an indefinite leave of absence, the latter reserving his rights under the original contract.—Stearns v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 112 Mich. 651.

Right to wages or other compensation, see post § 10 et seq.
Compensation for overtime or extra services, see post § 13.
Right to discharge or dismiss servant, see post § 17.
Evidence as to failure to perform duties, see post § 21.
Liability of master for injuries to servant, see post III.
Liability of master for injuries to third persons, see post IV.
Duty of servant, who is also bailee, as to care and keeping of bailed goods, see also Bailments ¶ 21.
Injunction against disclosure of trade secrets or misuse of them by an employee, who learned them by reason of his employment without right to divulge them, see Injunctions, II, F.
Fidelity bonds against defalcations of servant, see Indemnity § 3.
Provisions as to embezzlement from employer, see Comp. L. 1915, § 15310.
Provisions against influencing employee in his political opinions, see Comp. L. 1915, § 3842.

¶ 29. It is the duty of a servant to be loyal and obedient to his master.—Kyselka v. Northern Assur. Co. of Michigan, 194 Mich. 430.

¶ 30. When one engages in another's employment he undertakes to obey all lawful orders, and subjects himself for failure to do so to liability to discharge and damages.—Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Bayfield, 37 Mich. 205.

¶ 31. One employed by the year on a salary is bound to devote his time diligently and faithfully to the business interests of his employers, and to do nothing which will hinder or compete with those interests; but this will not prevent his rendering civilities or services to others which do not conflict with his duties to his employers, or prejudice their interests.—Geiger v. Harris, 19 Mich. 209.

¶ 32. A traveling agent commits no violation of duty by taking, gratuitously, orders for goods upon a house in whose service he has formerly been engaged; he not having solicited them, and it not appearing that such orders were in any way prejudicial to the interests of his employers.—Geiger v. Harris, 19 Mich. 209.

¶ 33. Under an ordinary hiring by the day, the party cannot be required to prolong his service in order to complete any particular piece of work upon which he may happen to be employed.—Wyngert v. Norton, 4 Mich. 286.

¶ 34. The rule that all the time and labor of an employee belong to the employer during the hours of service applies where a railroad employee, who receives a stated salary as clerk, acts as customs broker and receives fees for such services, especially where he promises to remit such fees to the employer.—Duluth, S. S. & A. Ry. Co. v. Wilson, 200 Mich. 313.

¶ 35. In general, one who engages to render skilled services undertakes for reasonable skill and for good faith, and is liable for negligence or dishonest service, but not for errors of judgment; the risk of those is on the employer.—Page v. Wells, 37 Mich. 415.

¶ 36. An arrangement by which one is to receive compensation for minutes to be obtained by him of valuable lands of a certain quality is an employment, and not a sale of information, and implies no warranty of the absolute truth of the descriptions, and the employee is not liable for mistakes. Though if, in furnishing descriptions of land, he misleads or injures his employer by a positive affirmation of their quality, when he knows nothing about it, he would be liable for bad faith or negligence.—Page v. Wells, 37 Mich. 415.

¶ 37. An agreement to respect the secrets of manufacturing processes will be implied from the nature of the employment and the confidence bestowed on the employee though there is nothing expressed thereabout.—O. & W. Thum Co. v. Tloczynski, 114 Mich. 149.

¶ 38. A master mechanic who agrees to devote his entire time and energy towards the welfare of the company employing him, and also agrees that any invention he should make as a result of his employment, in the nature of machinery to be used by such company, shall belong to the company, is prohibited under his agreement from working upon the same character of inventions at his home, without the company's knowledge, for the purpose of using them to his own advantage after his connection with the company had ceased.—Detroit Lubricator Co. v. Lavigne, 151 Mich. 650.

¶ 39. In hiring plaintiff to install and repair an engine, the defendant has a right to require that plaintiff shall possess and use reasonable skill in doing the work before being liable to pay him his wages.—Smith v. Hertz & Hosbach Co., 160 Mich. 431.

¶ 40. Under a contract of employment to learn a trade, the terms therein govern, and the parties have no right to demand rights and privileges outside of such contract.—Lepan v. MacKinnon Boiler & Machine Co., 178 Mich. 18.

Regulation of hours of labor as class legislation, see Constitutional Law § 218.

¶ 41. It is very doubtful whether the statute making ten hours a legal day's work in factories, workshops, etc., covers services as a night watchman in the horse barns of a car company.—Bartlett v. Grand Rapids Street R. Co., 82 Mich. 658.

¶ 42. Laws of 1885, Act No. 137 (How. St. § 1997a6), making ten hours a legal day's work, does not apply to a contract with an expert in taking, finishing and retouching photographs, or to service or employment under a hiring by the week, month or year.—Schurr v. Savigny, 85 Mich. 144.

Right to wages as dependent on skill and ability to perform duties, see also ante § 8.

Estoppel to claim wages, see also post ¶¶ 61, 63.

Store manager's right to commissions as postmaster, see post ¶ 68.

Action for wages, see post § 26 et seq.

Burden of proof as to right to wages, see post § 27.

Evidence as to wages or other compensation, see post §§ 21, 28.

Evidence of waiver of agreed salary, see post ¶ 118.

Assignability of wages to accrue, see Assignments § 4.

Validity of payment without notice of assignment, see Assignments § 3.

Assignment of wages to be earned in the future under an existing employment, see Assignments, I.

Direct promises of third persons to pay servants, see also Contracts § 13.

Usage as to compensation to control terms of contract, see Customs § 12.

Specific enforcement of agreements for shares or stocks as compensation, see Specific Performance.

Exemption of wages, see Exemptions § 26.

Labor liens, see Liens § 5; Mechanics' Liens.

Provisions as to semi-monthly payment of wages, see Comp. L. 1915, §§ 5583-5586.

¶ 43. An agreement to pay a servant what the employer thinks he is worth binds the latter to pay what the services are reasonably worth, and does not leave him to fix his wages at such sum as he sees fit after the services are performed, although such an agreement would be valid if understood.—Millar v. Cuddy, 43 Mich. 273.

¶ 44. Where one employed for an indefinite time continues work after the managing agent through whom he was employed has assumed control of the business as principal, he can recover against the former employer for his wages subsequently accruing if he had no notice of the change of employers.—Tousignant v. Shafer Iron Co., 96 Mich. 87.

¶ 45. A contract of employment dated January 1, 1893, by which the employee was "to receive $1,200 per year until further notice, or during the year 1893," the salary not to be reduced in any event, is not a contract from year to year, and the employee, on being discharged, after having worked a year and eight months, cannot recover compensation for the balance of the year.—Fuller v. Peninsular White Lead & Color Works, 111 Mich. 221.

¶ 46. Where the plaintiff had agreed to work for a year on a basis of a percentage of the gross receipts, but left the employment after two and a half months, he could recover, if at all, only the average rate for the entire twelve months, and he could not select the period when the receipts were the greatest and make this the basis of computing his percentage.—Kendall v. Chapel, 147 Mich. 709.

¶ 47. Where plaintiff, in an action on a contract for wages earned, did not perform any service, held that he earned no salary. —Wray v. Tilden Saw Co., 198 Mich. 461.

Servant and joint adventurer distinguished, see ante § 3.

¶ 48. In fixing the profits of a business for the purpose of complying with a contract giving the manager a share of the profits at the end of each year, the employer is not entitled to deduct interest on his investment in the absence of any provision in the contract for such deduction.—Morrow v. Murphy, 120 Mich. 204.

¶ 49. In fixing the estimate of the profits of a business for the purpose of compliance with a contract giving the manager a share of the profits for the year, actions in tort, pending against the employer, the damages being unliquidated, cannot be considered, there being no amount which can be deducted in fixing the profits.—Morrow v. Murphy, 120 Mich. 204.

¶ 50. Plaintiff made an agreement of employment with defendants by which he was to buy and sell horses and receive 33⅓% of the net profits. Defendants were to furnish the capital and pay his expenses. Plaintiff was not to be a partner and was not to be liable for any portion of the losses. Settlements and balances were to be paid to plaintiff quarterly. Held, plaintiff was not entitled to his 33⅓% at the end of the quarter for the conclusion of sales where promissory notes were given in payment, but was only entitled to recover as the notes were paid and capital, expenses and losses deducted.—Crawford v. Calkins, 170 Mich. 587.

¶ 51. A contract between a firm and a traveling salesman provided that the salesman should enter upon his duties for the term of one year from the date of the contract, for the sale of $40,000 worth of goods; that he should receive $800 and his traveling expenses; that all mail orders received from his territory should be credited to his sales account; that he should receive, in addition to said salary, 1 per cent on all goods in excess of $40,000 sold by him, and shipped and paid for; that if, at the end of the year, his sales should fall short of $40,000, 2 per cent on the deficiency should be deducted from his salary. Held, that the contract does not provide for monthly payments; that, in view of the fact that money was asked and furnished at intervals, the most reasonable construction is that the salesman was to be paid from time to time on the basis of goods sold and shipped, but not beyond the rate of $800 per annum and traveling expenses.—Reynolds v. Reeder, 104 Mich. 265.

¶ 52. Under a contract of employment of a salesman providing for commissions of 7 per cent on all sales and a drawing account of $100 per month, traveling expenses, and drawings to be deducted before payment of commission, the words "drawing account" are held to imply a guaranty of commission with no obligation to repay the amount so drawn. —Christopher v. Hechheimer, 127 Mich. 451.

¶ 53. The term "drawing account" as used in a contract of employment of a traveling salesman is not understood by persons not familiar with the trade and it is proper to introduce testimony as to its meaning.— Christopher v. Hechheimer, 127 Mich. 451.

¶ 54. Under an apprenticeship contract where a per diem bonus is provided for payable at the end of the term and the apprentice is discharged, no recovery can be had for such bonus, since such provision cannot be considered as a part of the agreed wages, but only as a reward in the event the apprentice stays for the full term.—Lepan v. MacKinnon Boiler & Machine Co., 178 Mich. 18.

Evidence as to change of salary, see post ¶ 110.

¶ 55. Where, by reason of the change of work of a mechanic to that requiring increased skill, he is promised an indefinite increase of wages, he is entitled to have the new rate fixed, and if he receives an increased sum for months, without fraud or deception on his part, defendant cannot, on the ground of an alleged mistake in such payment, prevent a recovery by the mechanic at the increased rate.—Kennedy v. Murphy Iron Works, 91 Mich. 500.

¶ 56. Where a master notifies his servant that he will hereafter pay him less, and the servant continues work without notifying his master that he will claim more, it constitutes a new arrangement.—Spicer v. Earl, 41 Mich. 191.

¶ 57. Under a contract of employment to saw logs or to do whatever else he was directed to do, pursuant to which the employee acted as engineer when it was ascertained that there was no engineer at hand, the parties were bound by their own construction of the contract to the effect that services as engineer were not included, and that therefore a higher rate of wages should be paid than provided.—Wilson v. Godkin, 136 Mich. 106.

Deductions under profit sharing agreements, see also ante § 11.

¶ 58. The existence of an express contract for hire for one year, at a stated weekly compensation, excludes any implied agreement or understanding about wages, and the contract price cannot be increased without a further agreement to that effect between the parties. So held when the employee under such a contract, after the expiration of the year, sought to recover for extra work, and double compensation for two weeks allowed to him for a vacation, but of which he did not avail himself.—Schurr v. Savigny, 85 Mich. 144.

¶ 59. One who has contracted with knowledge of, and with reference to, the invariable custom and rule of his employer that its employees shall work for the sum agreed upon as one day's pay, as many hours as its convenience or business demands, and who knew that the authority of his employer's officers to employ men was limited to so much per day, regardless of the number of hours worked, cannot recover for work beyond ten hours per day under Laws of 1885, Act No. 137, making ten hours a legal day's work in factories, etc.—Bartlett v. Grand Rapids Street R. Co., 82 Mich. 658.

¶ 60. All claims for extra time and not merely that within the final pay-roll period are covered by a receipt read to and assented to by an employee, when quitting its service, which receipt acknowledged payment of the amount specified "in full of all demands for work done during the regular and irregular working hours in the service of said company [defendant] up to and including the date of this pay-roll."—Bartlett v. Grand Rapids Street R. Co., 82 Mich. 658.

¶ 61. An employee who works for a company for about four years, being paid weekly for his services, and who gives receipts in full for the wages paid him, is estopped to claim that he was entitled to compensation for overtime, especially where he makes no claim for such additional compensation until nearly four months after he has left the employ, at which time he rendered a statement of overtime of employees under him but said nothing of his own claim.—Davis v. Detroit Boat Works, 121 Mich. 261.

¶ 62. A foreman in a freight yard of a railroad company cannot receive pay for overtime for work performed on Sundays where it appears that the work was not one of necessity but could as well have been performed on Monday by the employment of more help by the employee.—Bidwell v. Grand Trunk W. R. Co., 148 Mich. 524.

¶ 63. One who keeps a boarding-house for 57 months, presenting an account each month and receiving her pay therefor, is estopped to maintain a claim, after leaving the work, for services for attending a telephone which was kept at the boarding house for the use of the defendant company, the plaintiff, and the boarders, and for which she made no claim while in the defendant's employ.—Lachine v. Manistique R. Co., 126 Mich. 519.

¶ 64. Deductions for an employee's use of time that does not belong to his employer cannot be made from his compensation.—Geiger v. Harris, 19 Mich. 209; People ex rel. Benoit v. Miller, 24 Mich. 458.

¶ 65. A servant may recover under the common counts in assumpsit for the value of services performed under a contract with defendant, subject to a deduction where he leaves the service before the stipulated time.—Williams v. Crane, 153 Mich. 89.

¶ 66. A servant agreed to manage defendant's farm as tenant. Later they agreed to change the relation to that of master and servant, and that the relation should relate back to the beginning of the tenancy. Before the altered relations, the servant had received money for work done for others after the tenancy began, but defendant did not lose anything through his absence while doing this work. Held, in an action by the servant to recover the value of his services, that defendant was not entitled to be credited for such money, but that he could not be charged with plaintiff's time while earning it.—Williams v. Crane, 153 Mich. 89.

¶ 67. When an employee voluntarily quits the services of his employer, his right to occupy, by virtue of his employment and contract of hiring, a dwelling house of his employer immediately ceases.—Lane v. Au Sable Elec. Co., 181 Mich. 26.

¶ 68. A person employed to manage the general store of a quarry company is entitled to his commissions as postmaster, although the quarry company may have been influential in securing his appointment, furnished a place in which to keep the office, and provided light, heat and occasionally help.—Bailey v. Sibley Quarry Co., 166 Mich. 321.

¶ 69. A provision for the retention of six days' pay until the completion of the contract of employment in question, was valid and was not for a penalty on the theory that the retention was intended to cover different breaches varying in importance, thus raising the presumption that it was not intended as furnishing compensation.—Wilson v. Godkin, 136 Mich. 106.

Actions for wages, see post § 26.
General law of equity, see Equity.
General law as to accounting, see Accounting Suits.
Sufficiency of jurisdictional allegations in bill for accounting in equity, see also Equity § 83.

¶ 70. A traveling salesman whose contract of employment secures him his traveling expenses is entitled to reimbursement for the expenses of necessary trips to headquarters and of hotel bills while there.—Lamb v. Henderson, 63 Mich. 302.

¶ 71. Where a bill for an accounting alleges an agreement between a mother and her son whereby the son and his wife were to labor on the farm and to receive a certain wage, that the son appropriated the profits of the farm, and that a fiduciary relation existed between the parties, it is sufficient to warrant the interference of equity.—Graham v. Graham, 171 Mich. 307.

¶ 72. Grounds for equitable relief are disclosed by a bill of complaint alleging in substance a contract between the complainant and the defendant whereby the former was to receive a percentage of the profits of a business for a term of three years, the fraudulent concealment of profits by the defendant, and the practice of fraud to reduce them to the complainant's detriment, and praying for an accounting and discovery.—Reid v. Heater, 184 Mich. 184.

Rights and duties of master and servant, see ante § 8.
Actions for wrongful discharge, see post § 19.
Conditions precedent to action for discharge, see post ¶¶ 88, 89.
Burden of proof as to discharge, see post § 20.
Presumptions as to continuation of employment, see post §§ 20, 27.
Evidence to show grounds for discharge, see post §§ 21, 22.
Fitness of place to work as affecting right of apprentice to quit, see Apprentices ¶ 3.
Measure of damages for breach of contract for services, see Damages § 80.
Duty to seek other work to reduce damages, see Damages §§ 21, 80.

¶ 73. Employers cannot assume to final judges in their own behalf of the propriety of dismissing their employees during their term of employment, unless they also take the responsibility which attaches to dismissals without actual cause.—Jones v. Graham & Morton Transp. Co., 51 Mich. 539.

¶ 74. An employer has no arbitrary power to dismiss his employee for a disobedience to orders that involve no serious consequences and is not "wilful" in the sense of being perverse, insubordinate or unreasonable. Nor can disobedience be made a pretext for dismissal apart from the injury it causes. Whether even a menial or domestic servant can be dismissed for mere harmless disobedience, quære.—Shaver v. Ingham, 58 Mich. 649.

¶ 75. In contracts of employment dismissal is warranted by any act of the servant which is prejudicial, or likely to be prejudicial, to the interests of the employer.—Robinson v. Western U. Tel. Co., 169 Mich. 503.

¶ 76. A master or employer is justified in discharging his servant or employee for any breach of the express or implied conditions of the contract of employment.—Robinson v. Western U. Tel. Co., 169 Mich. 503.

¶ 77. The refusal of a street railway superintendent to obey the instructions of the president of the company, to whom the management of its affairs has been intrusted, constitutes a breach of his agreement to perform such duties as might be required of him by the company, and justifies his discharge.—Degen v. Manistee, F. C. & E. L. R. Co., 113 Mich. 66.

¶ 78. The fact that an engineer, after he had been discharged by the captain of a yacht and paid off, made an assault upon the captain which, had it occurred before his discharge, would have justified his dismissal, cannot be considered in an action by the engineer against the owner for breach of his contract of employment.—Gerardo v. Brush, 120 Mich. 405.

¶ 79. Where a bookkeeper, who is employed at a yearly salary, makes unauthorized overdrafts from his employer's money, of which he has the handling, the employer is authorized to discharge him before the end of the year, and demand repayment.—Smith v. Baker, 101 Mich. 155.

¶ 80. The words "I am very sorry to have to ask you to resign your position," in a letter from an employer to his employee, are properly construed as a peremptory discharge.—Jones v. Graham & Morton Transp. Co., 51 Mich. 539.

¶ 81. A letter to plaintiff from defendant, informing him of pending negotiations which, if they went through, would enable the latter to retire certain loans, and relieve plaintiff of liability on endorsements, in which event plaintiff's services would be no longer needed, and would mean the termination of his "service contract" and asking "an expression concerning same" from him, plaintiff replying that he would resign when the loans were fully paid and he was relieved of liability on his indorsements, and repaid the amount of his investment made as consideration of the contract, does not indicate a discharge of plaintiff.—Hinchman v. Matheson Motor Car Co., 151 Mich. 214.

¶ 82. An employee who is hired by two corporations under a single contract is discharged from both corporations by letters written on the letterhead of one corporation, one signed by the secretary and one signed by the president of both corporations, and both making it clear that he is discharged from "the company" without indicating which company, where the letters were in reply to a written claim for back salary made and addressed to both companies and both letters computed the entire salary due from both companies.—Schaub v. Welded-Barrel Co., 125 Mich. 591.

¶ 83. A levy of execution upon stock and and business of an employer, and a sale by the sheriff do not justify an employee in treating the contract as abrogated, or assuming that the employer cannot carry out its contract.—Nash v. H. R. Gladding Co., 118 Mich. 529.

Settlement of claim as consideration for life or term employment, see Contracts § 115.
Mutuality of agreement for life employment in consideration of settlement of claims, see Contracts § 2, ¶ 9.
Measure of damages for breach of contract of employment for life, see Damages § 81.

¶ 84. An agreement to employ the plaintiff "so long as his services and conduct are satisfactory" is terminable by the employer whenever in his opinion the services are not to his entire satisfaction and the reasons for or the justice of the defendant's dissatisfaction cannot be inquired into.—Sax v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 125 Mich. 252.

¶ 85. Under an agreement to employ the plaintiff "so long as his services and conduct are satisfactory" where it affirmatively appears that the plaintiff was not laid off because of dissatisfaction, a failure to re-employ him is a breach of the contract.—Sax v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 125 Mich. 252.

¶ 86. Where a person contracts to enter into service "subject to the general control and satisfaction" of his employer, the latter is the sole judge, and courts will not inquire into the reasonableness or justice of his discharging such servant on the ground of dissatisfaction.—Schmand v. Jandorf, 175 Mich. 88.

¶ 87. Under a contract with defendant railroad company entitling an injured employee to employment at a fixed monthly salary during his life, or during his ability and disposition to perform the duties pertaining to said employment, he is subject to discharge and forfeits his rights if he becomes incompetent, unfaithful, or disobedient.—Brighton v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 103 Mich. 420.

Grounds for discharge or dismissal, see ante § 17.
Amount of damages for discharge or breach of contract, see post § 25.
Actions for wages, see post § 26.
Pleading condition on which employment was to continue, see also Contracts ¶ 1179.
Amendments of pleadings, see Pleading, VI.

¶ 88. A vessel captain who has been peremptorily discharged by the owner of the vessel for unfitness is not bound to offer to resume command before leaving and beginning suit against the owner on the contract of employment between them. He owes defendant no further duty than to use reasonable diligence to obtain other employment.—Jones v. Graham & Morton Transp. Co., 51 Mich. 539.

¶ 89. An engineer of a yacht, claiming to have been hired for the season, who is dismissed at the end of a month by the captain on the theory that he was employed from month to month, is not precluded from insisting upon damages for breach of the contract by the fact that he did not hunt up the owner and inform him of his dismissal.—Gerardo v. Brush, 120 Mich. 405.

¶ 90. In an action for breach of contract to employ where the plaintiff was discharged by the employer, under the right to terminate the contract at any time, the plaintiff may treat the contract as performed by him if in fact he has actually performed up to the time of discharge.—Pungs v. American Brake-Beam Co., 128 Mich. 318.

¶ 91. Assumpsit on a contract of employment, where the declaration sets forth the contract in full,—that plaintiff entered upon his duties, that he was paid to a certain time, that he was at all times prepared and ready to continue to discharge the duties of his employment,—and refusal of defendant to pay, is the proper form of action to recover, where plaintiff has been discharged before the expiration of the contract.—Hinchman v. Matheson Motor Car Co., 151 Mich. 214.

¶ 92. Where a servant is dismissed before the period of service contracted for, a suit in which the bill of particulars alleges that damage is claimed for what plaintiff would have earned if allowed to complete the contract, is a suit for damages and not for wages, and defendant is not misled.—Webb v. Depew, 152 Mich. 698.

¶ 93. In an action for the value of services rendered under a special contract the defendant may show the unsatisfactory nature of the services without a plea of recoupment.—Pungs v. American Brake-Beam Co., 128 Mich. 318.

¶ 94. In an action on a special contract of employment by an employee discharged for non-performance the defendant may show the unsatisfactory nature of the services rendered by way of defense without a plea of recoupment notwithstanding the defendant reserved the right to terminate the employment at any time.—Pungs v. American Brake-Beam Co., 128 Mich. 318.

Presumptions and burden of proof in actions for wages, see post § 27.
Presumptions and burden of proof in actions by servant for injury, see post §§ 62, 63.
General law as to presumptions and burden of proof, see Evidence, II.
Burden of proof that servant might have had other employment in reduction of damages, see Damages § 291.

¶ 95. Where, under a contract for a year's service, the employee has gone on from year to year, and at the end of a year is allowed to go on without objection, a presumption arises which in an action for wrongful discharge will warrant a jury in finding that the parties to the contract have assented to its continuing in force for another year.—Sines v. Wayne County Poor Superintendents, 58 Mich. 503, 55 Mich. 383.

¶ 96. Where under a contract for a year's services the employee at the end of the year is allowed to continue at work without objection, a presumption arises warranting the jury in finding that the parties to the contract had assented to its being continued in force for another year.—Reynick v. Allington & Curtis Mfg. Co., 179 Mich. 630.

¶ 97. A plaintiff who was personally employed by defendant is bound, in an action for wages claimed to be due for the period after an alleged wrongful dismissal, to show actual authority from defendant to the person assuming to discharge him, or actual knowledge and approval of his discharge; and he was bound to see that defendant had knowledge that he refused to acquiesce in his discharge, and that he proposed to hold himself ready at all times to resume his labor.—Collins v. Hazelton, 65 Mich. 220.

¶ 98. In an action for a wrongful discharge from employment, the burden of showing good and sufficient cause for such discharge rests upon defendant, after plaintiff has proved the contract, and its performance by him up to the time of his dismissal; Milligan v. Sligh Furniture Co., 111 Mich. 629.

¶ 99. In assumpsit on a contract of employment, the burden of proof rests on defendant to show sufficient cause for plaintiff's discharge from its employment.—Hinchman v. Matheson Motor Car Co., 151 Mich. 214.

Matters justifying discharge or dismissal, see ante § 17.
Issues and variance, see ante § 19.
Admissibility of evidence in actions for wages, see post § 28.
Evidence in actions for injury to servant, see post § 64.
Evidence in actions by third persons against master, see post § 79.
General law of evidence, see Evidence.
Admissibility of evidence as to parties to contract, see Contracts §§ 310, 311.

¶ 100. In an action to recover a balance of salary after wrongful discharge, evidence of an initial hiring for one year and a new arrangement from year to year is competent to show the existence of a year's contract at the time of discharge.—Wright v. Elk Rapids Iron Co., 129 Mich. 543.

¶ 101. Proof of the actual fitness of an employee who has been discharged is proper in an action by him on the contract of employment.—Jones v. Graham & Morton Transp. Co., 51 Mich. 539.

¶ 102. Where a salesman receives a fixed sum for traveling expenses, and a salary dependent upon the amount of his sales, it is admissible, when he sues upon his contract of employment, to show his lack of diligence in reduction or bar of damages.—Alberts v. Stearns, 50 Mich. 349.

¶ 103. In an action for wrongful discharge from service defendant may show the amount of goods sold by plaintiff, and that they were sold contrary to instructions, that he sold scarcely any goods, that he might have sold large quantities, and that his work was not done according to agreement and was by reason thereof worthless.—Child v. Detroit Mfg. Co., 72 Mich. 623.

¶ 104. In suit for damages for wrongful discharge from service under a contract whereby plaintiff was to give his exclusive time and services to defendant in consideration of a certain salary, defendant may show on cross-examination of plaintiff that when plaintiff was employed he made false representations to defendant, that he refused to obey instructions, that he did not perform defendant's work as he promised, that he did not work enough to earn his salary, and that he received pay from other parties while in defendant's employ.—Child v. Detroit Mfg. Co., 72 Mich. 623.

¶ 105. Plaintiff, claiming to have been wrongfully dismissed from service before an alleged yearly term was up, sued for wages due for the period after the dismissal. It appearing that pay had always been balanced monthly, it was error to exclude a question to plaintiff whether he had ever asked for any pay for such period after dismissal.—Collins v. Hazelton, 65 Mich. 220.

¶ 106. In an action by one who, having been employed as a fur-cutter, was discharged for incompetency, evidence that defendants employed the same fur-cutters while plaintiff was with them as before, and that the work was good before they hired plaintiff, does not tend to show his incompetency, and is inadmissible.—Koehler v. Buhl, 94 Mich. 496.

¶ 107. While the discharge of a traveling salesman may be justified by his failure to obey instructions with reference to places to be visited and the manner of making sales, a disregard of instructions in these particulars cannot be inferred from the fact that the sales did not fulfil the expectations of his employer, and evidence to that effect should be excluded in an action by him for a wrongful discharge.—Milligan v. Sligh Furniture Co., 111 Mich. 629.

¶ 108. Under a contract of apprenticeship where wrongful discharge is claimed, the superintendent's evidence that according to his observations the apprentice was not working faithfully is admissible on the question of proper cause for the discharge.—Lepan v. MacKinnon Boiler & Machine Co., 178 Mich. 18.

¶ 109. In an action for wrongful discharge of an apprentice, the foreman's evidence as to a general custom of putting apprentices at other work than the trade they were learning, and the benefit to be derived therefrom, held improperly excluded.—Lepan v. MacKinnon Boiler & Machine Co., 178 Mich. 18.

As to what amounts to a discharge, see also ante § 17.

¶ 110. That an employer agreed to increase an employee's salary from a future date to a fixed sum per year does not establish a contract of hiring for a year from such date.—Donnelly v. Michigan Malleable Iron Co., 181 Mich. 333.

¶ 111. A leave of absence and not a discharge is shown by evidence that a lumber measurer, asking permission to go away for a few days and offering to provide a substitute, was told that in view of a customer's dissatisfaction with measurements he might go, that he was paid up to that time and did go and never returned, it being disputed whether he went away conditionally on being back by a certain time or on condition that he would be called by telegraph when needed.—Pinet v. Montague, 103 Mich. 516.

¶ 112. In an action by an emancipated minor against a husband and wife for damages for breach of a contract to furnish plaintiff shelter, food, clothing and education in consideration of the performance of personal services, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that plaintiff was not in default for not returning after being notified not to return by the wife.—Fox v. Schumann, 191 Mich. 331.

¶ 113. In an action by an insurance agent against the insurance company to recover renewal commissions as provided by his contract, and to which he would have been entitled if he had resigned and had not been discharged, letters in evidence written by the plaintiff to the officers and agents of defendant, criticizing the policy and methods of business of the company, construed as not having been written in a spirit of insubordination but rather with a desire to ascertain the truth and condition of the company and protect if possible the plaintiff's legitimate interests, so as to not constitute just ground for dismissal.—Kyselka v. Northern Assur. Co. of Michigan, 194 Mich. 430.

In actions for wages, see post § 30.
In actions for injury to servant, see post § 67 et seq.
In actions by third persons against master, see post § 80.
General law as to questions of law and fact, see Trial, VI.

¶ 114. It is for the jury to say whether the employee's conduct was so unreasonable or insubordinate as to justify the master in dismissing him.—Shaver v. Ingham, 58 Mich. 649.

¶ 115. The question as to whether an employee (a general superintendent) was guilty of such insubordination as to justify his discharge where he used disrespectful language to the president, but where the latter used provocative language, considering that such employee occupied a position of great responsibility, is for the jury in an action for the breach of a contract of employment.—Schaub v. Arc Welding Co., 123 Mich. 487.

¶ 116. In an action on a contract of hire the question was whether the period of employment was by the year or by the month. The contract itself stated that the one party agreed to pay the other a specified sum "per year, payable in monthly payments." Payments were in fact made monthly, but in the course of the third year of employment the employee was discharged. Toward the close of the second year he had asked his employer if he was satisfied and the latter had said that he was. Held, that these facts were for the jury, who were to determine what the understanding of the parties was as to the period of hire.—Tallon v. Grand Portage Copper Min. Co., 55 Mich. 147.

¶ 117. Where, by a resolution of the board of trustees of a school district, the lowest bidder for the janitorship of its school building is employed for such time as he shall faithfully perform the duties of the position to the satisfaction of the board, and no longer, and, after a year's trial, he is re-employed from year to year at an annual salary, it cannot be assumed, as matter of law, that the parties understood that the board, with each re-employment, reserved the right to terminate the contract of hiring at will.—Laughlin v. Jackson City School Dist. No. 17, 98 Mich. 523.

¶ 118. Acceptance for fifteen years of a reduced salary by one to whom another has agreed to furnish employment for life at a fixed monthly salary is evidence of a waiver of his right to the agreed salary for such period, and, if unexplained, amounts in law to such waiver.—Brighton v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 103 Mich. 420.

¶ 119. The action of traveling salesman in leaving his designated route on Saturday night, to spend Sunday with his family, does not, as a matter of law, constitute a breach of the employment contract justifying his discharge; especially if it does not appear but that he returned to his route in time to comply with his contract.—Milligan v. Sligh Furniture Co., 111 Mich. 629.

¶ 120. The mere planning by an employee during his contract of employment to engage, after the expiration thereof, in a competing business, does not justify his discharge as a matter of law.—Meyers v. Roger J. Sullivan Co., 166 Mich. 193.

¶ 121. Where, in a suit to recover the balance of salary alleged to be due under a contract of hiring by the year, there is a sharp conflict of testimony upon the question whether plaintiff consented to the termination of the contract, said question is properly left to the jury.—Bailey v. Sibley Quarry Co., 169 Mich. 227.

¶ 122. In an action to recover for the balance due on a contract of employment the question as to whether the plaintiff was rightfully discharged for insubordination was for the jury. Lengthy instructions given on this point were held proper.—Ernst v. Grand Rapids Engraving Co., 173 Mich. 254.

¶ 123. Plaintiff contended that after having been hired by defendant corporation by the month he informed the board of directors that he must be assured employment for a year, to which they assented, but no formal record was made and he thereafter continued to work for nearly a year and a half, while defendant's officers denied an employment from year to year contending that plaintiff was to be employed as long as his services were satisfactory. It was held that the evidence presented a question for the jury.—Reynick v. Allington & Curtis Mfg. Co., 179 Mich. 630.

¶ 124. Plaintiff contracted to work as manager and buyer for defendant for a period of two years. During about the first six months of his employment he planned to organize and engage in a competing business, such business not to begin until the expiration of his contract with defendant. Defendant knew of his plans and expressed approval of the services being rendered by him. In a suit for breach of the contract for discharging plaintiff, held the trial court erred in directing a verdict for defendant on the ground that his conduct amounted, as a matter of law, to a breach of his contract.—Meyers v. Roger J. Sullivan Co., 166 Mich. 193.

In actions for wages of servant, see post § 31.

In actions for injury to servant, see post § 71 et seq.

In actions by third persons against master, see post § 81.

General law of instructions, see Instructions.

¶ 125. In an action on a contract of hire a request to charge that if plaintiff had secured other employment, at lower wages, and had abandoned it, he could only recover the difference between the amount sued for and the amount he would have earned under the later employment, is sufficiently covered by the instruction that he is bound to obtain other employment if he can, and that what he would earn at it must be deducted from the amount of his recovery, even if he had relinquished such other employment.—Champlain v. Detroit Stamping Co., 68 Mich. 238.

¶ 126. A charge "whether he hired him for another year or not, I will not say; but it is for you to say exactly the language that the plaintiff used as to the time," and "if you believe from all the evidence * * * that it was on June 1 that the parties had this conversation, then the plaintiff is to recover," construed as a whole, submitted fairly to the jury the question of plaintiff's alleged hiring, and the date thereof; where it was claimed by plaintiff, in an action for breach of contract of hiring, that after receiving notice that his services would not be needed at the close of his fiscal year, he was engaged by defendant for another year, but where defendant claimed the second contract of hiring was until the end of the calendar year, only.—Thompson v. Detroit & L. S. Copper Co., 80 Mich. 422.

¶ 127. In an action by an employee hired for a term under an agreement to do satisfactory work and afterwards discharged for incompetency, an instruction that if the employers became aware of his incompetency it was their duty to make it known to him within a reasonable time is erroneous; such a rule would require an employer to take advantage of the first infraction of the contract, and, if he did not do so, would make an incompetent workman secure in his employment.—Koehler v. Buhl, 94 Mich. 496.

¶ 128. In an action to recover salary for five months under a contract for a year where the plaintiff was discharged for violation of the contract with one month and four days owing, it is error in the absence of a claim for recoupment for damages occasioned by the breach of the contract, to instruct the jury that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover for his services up to the time of the discharge, and to direct a verdict for defendant, as the retention in service was some evidence of the plaintiff's right to salary.—Pungs v. American Brake-Beam Co., 124 Mich. 344.

¶ 129. In an action to recover a balance of salary after wrongful discharge, an instruction that if the plaintiff applied for a letter of recommendation leading the defendant to believe he was accepting his discharge, he could not recover, is properly modified by adding that if the plaintiff gave notice that he claimed under a contract by the year and intended to enforce it he was entitled to recover.—Wright v. Elk Rapids Iron Co., 129 Mich. 543.

¶ 130. In an action for breach of a contract of employment by a dismissal an instruction interpreting testimony to the effect that the contract was terminable on thirty days' notice is prejudicial error where the instruction was not supported by the evidence.—McDonald v. Ideal Mfg. Co., 143 Mich. 17.

Measure of damages for breach of contract for services, see Damages § 80.

Forfeiture of accrued wages as liquidated damages for breach, see Damages § 185.

Adequacy and excessiveness of award for breach of contract of employment for life, see Damages § 222.

¶ 131. In a suit for damages for breach of a contract of service for a given period, the plaintiff is not limited to an assessment of damages up to date of trial, but is entitled to damages for the whole period.—Webb v. Depew, 152 Mich. 698.

¶ 132. One who is under a contract of employment for a year and whose engagement is practically terminated by his employer within that period is entitled to such damages as will make him good for the loss of his situation, if he has fully performed his obligation and stands ready to continue to do so.—Alberts v. Stearns, 50 Mich. 349.

¶ 133. A party who is prevented from performing a contract involving his personal services by the wrongful act of the other party can recover what his time was worth while attempting to perform it, and his reasonable expenses.—Cadman v. Markle, 76 Mich. 448.

¶ 134. Where plaintiff, employed under a two year contract as manager and buyer, was wrongfully discharged by the defendant, he is entitled to recover up to the date of his discharge for his share of the net profits of the business, such percentage being granted to him as a part of his compensation under the terms of the contract.—Meyers v. Roger J. Sullivan Co., 166 Mich. 193.

Limitations of actions for work and labor or on express contracts for service, see Limitations §§ 57, 58.

Limitations of actions for services extended over long period, see Limitations § 58.

¶ 135. Where an express oral contract of employment for three years is declared upon and relied on, no recovery can be had on the theory that the contract was a hiring for a year, and that when the parties entered upon a new year by the payment and acceptance of the salary, a new contract was made for another year.—Smith v. Chase & Baker Piano Mfg. Co., 175 Mich. 371.

¶ 135a. An action will lie on the common counts for wages fairly earned by past services already rendered under an express agreement of which the defendant has prevented the full performance.—Mitchell v. Scott, 41 Mich. 108.

¶ 136. A fatal variance is not made out by a declaration alleging a contract of employment for $120 per month, a bill of particulars for 8 months at $90 per month, and evidence tending to show a hiring at "the going wage" which was at $100 to $120 per month. —De Land v. Hall, 134 Mich. 381.

¶ 137. Where plaintiff sues a corporate employer for services rendered at a monthly salary claimed by him under an alleged agreement for the same amount as he was to receive from defendant's predecessor for whom he had worked before employment by defendant, the amount under such prior employment being, however, disputed, he cannot show such prior employment and its terms, as a collateral issue would thus be raised. —Ganther v. James Jenks & Co., 76 Mich. 510.

In actions for wrongful discharge, see ante § 20.
Presumption as to re-employment, see also post ¶ 157.
In actions for injury to servant, see post §§ 62, 68.
General law as to burden of proof and presumptions, see Evidence, II.

¶ 138. Where one who has been employed at a specified salary per month is engaged for another year without anything being said as to wages, they will be presumed to continue at the old rate.—Thompson v. Detroit & L. S. Copper Co., 80 Mich. 422.

¶ 139. Where a contract of employment runs from February 9, 1909, to December 31, 1909, no presumption of renewal for another year on the same terms arises by reason of continuance in the same service after the expiration of said contract.—White v. United States Gypsum Co., 168 Mich. 238.

¶ 140. Retention in service is proof of the servant's right to wages until something is shown to the contrary, and the burden is not on him to prove that he has done everything incumbent on him, but is on the master to prove otherwise.—Bolt v. Frederick, 56 Mich. 20.

¶ 141. Where an employee, after his term of hiring expires, renders service of a different character for his former employer, it raises no presumption that his former contract is renewed.—White v. United States Gypsum Co., 168 Mich. 238.

¶ 142. In an action by a servant to recover the value of services performed for, and accepted by, defendant, the burden of proving his fidelity is not upon the servant, but the defendant must prove the contrary. —Williams v. Crane, 153 Mich. 89.

¶ 143. In an action to recover commissions claimed to have been earned under a contract of employment, the burden of proving items pleaded as a set-off is upon defendant.—Muir v. Kalamazoo Corset Co., 155 Mich. 441.

In actions for wrongful discharge, see ante § 21.
General law of evidence, see Evidence.
Admissibility of evidence as to parties to contract, see Contracts §§ 310, 311.
Res inter alios evidence as to expenses, comparison with others, see Evidence § 97.
Qualifications of experts as to value of services, see Evidence § 288.
Res gestæ of the contract, see also Evidence §§ 457, 458.
Evidence in assumpsit for reasonable worth, see also Assumpsit § 62.

¶ 144. In an action by a father to recover on the common counts for his minor son's services in peddling beer, it appeared that the son undertook to answer for any beer he should carry out and for which he should fail to bring back tickets or cash. Held, that defendant could show that defendant was dishonest and embezzled more than the amount of his unpaid wages. This would tend to show the reasonable value of the service and that it was not of value but positively injurious.—Schoenberg v. Voigt, 36 Mich. 310.

¶ 145. The actual value of services may be shown in an action on a contract of employment where there is a direct conflict of evidence as to the agreed rate of payment. —Richardson v. McGoldrick, 43 Mich. 476.

¶ 146. Where a company contracts to pay an employee "the same wages as shall be paid to other men in the employ of the company filling similar positions," and the laborer sues for compensation, and there is no showing that the company had other employees in similar positions, the plaintiff is entitled to prove what his services were worth.—Kent Furniture Mfg. Co. v. Ransom, 46 Mich. 416.

¶ 147. In an action of assumpsit upon the common counts, where plaintiff testified that he performed work and labor for defendant, it was held proper to ask him how much his services were worth.—McDonald v. McDonald, 67 Mich. 122.

¶ 148. Where the issue is whether plaintiff was hired at the same compensation as he received from a former employer, the individual predecessor of defendant, questions calling for evidence regarding the business of the former employer, and the skill and service of the plaintiff while in his employ, and what would be a low average rate of wages for the class of work then done, are properly excluded, the proper inquiry being as to the services performed for defendant, and their value.—Ganther v. James Jenks & Co., 76 Mich. 510.

¶ 149. Where, in an action for wages, the general issue without notice of set-off is pleaded, and there is no evidence that plaintiff's board was to be deducted from his wages, he cannot be asked on cross-examination questions intended to draw out that his board was paid by the defendant.—O'Hara v. Mernan, 79 Mich. 222.

¶ 150. Where plaintiff sues for services as a salesman in a carriage repository, and defendants deny all liability and any contract of employment whatever, it is proper to refuse to allow them to testify what wages they are paying to men in their livery barn. —Williams v. Williams, 82 Mich. 449.

¶ 151. Where one who has been succeeded as an employer by his former manager is sued by an employee for wages accruing after the change of employers, plaintiff alleging want of notice of the change, it is admissible to show the method of paying the men prior to the date of the change as well as after.—Tousignant v. Shafer Iron Co., 96 Mich. 87.

¶ 152. Where an express contract to pay for working overtime as engineer is alleged by plaintiff but denied by defendant, evidence by defendant to show what the custom is in other similar establishments is inadmissible.—Benedict v. Michigan Beef & Provision Co., 115 Mich. 527.

¶ 153. Testimony of an employee as to his willingness to carry out a contract of employment is properly excluded in an action for a balance due on the contract where it is shown that he quit and not shown that such willingness was expressed to the employer.—Nash v. H. R. Gladding Co., 118 Mich. 529.

¶ 154. Where the bookkeeper of a corporation performed certain services for the president of the corporation, evidence as to the manner in which the services for the corporation were performed is inadmissible in an action by the bookkeeper against the president for the personal services, there being no question made by either party that the contract with the corporation had been performed, and that plaintiff had received his pay therefor.—Fox v. Bialy, 151 Mich. 106.

¶ 155. Where, in an action by a servant to recover the value of services performed for defendant in conducting the latter's farm for the season, defendant testified that plaintiff's compensation was to depend upon the good results obtained, evidence of the gross income of the farm for that season was admissible.—Williams v. Crane, 153 Mich. 89.

¶ 156. Where, in an action for services, plaintiff admitted that he was discharging duties toward two other employers, for which he had brought suit, defendant is entitled to show, on cross-examination, the amount of the claim, and the character of the services for which he had sued.—Ruttle v. What Cheer Coal Min. Co., 153 Mich. 300.

Sufficiency of evidence showing promise to increase wages to support claim therefor, see Estates of Decedents ¶ 628.

¶ 157. Where the work under two successive employers was not continuous, there being a re-employment at the same work, after the change, of one who had ceased to work before the change took place, and where there is no evidence as to the nature of the re-employment except the new employer's testimony that after assuming control and relinquishing his agency he made no contracts in the old employer's name, the latter cannot be held liable in the absence of evidence to rebut the presumption that the re-employment was by his successor.—Tousignant v. Shafer Iron Co., 96 Mich. 87.

¶ 158. In an action to recover for services rendered a coal corporation, the only evidence as to the value of plaintiff's services was his own testimony that they were worth $5,000. Held, that such evidence was competent to support a recovery of $2,000, the services being of such character that it was practically impossible to value the separate items thereof as they were performed.—Ruttle v. What Cheer Coal Min. Co., 153 Mich. 300.

¶ 159. On September 1, 1908, plaintiff made a contract to work as salesman for defendant on commissions, for a period of three years. On February 9, 1909, said contract was canceled by mutual agreement and plaintiff signed another contract running from that date to December 31, 1909, on a salary basis. After December 31, 1909, plaintiff's contract was not definitely renewed, although he rendered some services for defendant at the request of an employee of defendant who was not authorized to hire salesmen. Held, the former three-year commission contract could have no effect as tending to show an implied renewal of the salary contract ending December 31, 1909.—White v. United States Gypsum Co., 168 Mich. 238.

¶ 160. In a suit to recover the balance of salary alleged to be due under a contract of hiring by the year, plaintiff testified that defendant offered him $1,000 a year in addition to house rent, heat and light for a year. He denied on cross-examination that he was to be paid at "the rate" of $1,000 a year, and stated that the number of years was not specified in the conversation with the defendant. Held, there was sufficient evidence to support a finding of the jury that the contract of hiring was by the year.—Bailey v. Sibley Quarry Co., 169 Mich. 227.

¶ 161. In an action against an estate to recover on an implied contract for services rendered deceased evidence held sufficient to show that an express contract was made whereby claimant was to render such services in consideration of the furnishing to him of board and room.—Hollister v. Kinyon's Estate, 195 Mich. 261.

¶ 162. Evidence held insufficient to sustain a verdict in favor of plaintiff officer for services under the contract with defendant corporation.—Clark v. Onoway-Alpena Telephone Co., 196 Mich. 168.

¶ 163. In an action on a contract for wages earned, where the defendant did not so arrange or force matters that plaintiff was admitted to earn his salary, held that the result was the same as if defendant had denied plaintiff opportunity to perform the contract, and, even if the contract was for a fixed period, plaintiff could not recover wages as such by a showing that he stood ready to perform.—Wray v. Tilden Saw Co., 198 Mich. 461.

In actions for injury to servant, see post § 67.

General law as to jury questions, see Trial, VI.

Direction of verdict on conflicting evidence, see also Directing Verdict ¶ 56.

¶ 164. Where there is some evidence tending to establish the claim of the plaintiff that defendant employed him, its weight and sufficiency are for the jury, and a verdict for plaintiff should not be directed.—Parrish v. Bradley, 73 Mich. 610.

¶ 165. Where the facts are undisputed, the question whether a contract for employment is made out or not is for the court.—Covel v. Turner, 74 Mich. 408.

¶ 166. In an action for compensation for work and labor, which action involves by neither pleadings nor evidence the theory of the plaintiff's having been deceived into contracting with one having apparent authority to act for the defendant, an actual authority must be proved in order to justify submission to the jury of the question whether the plaintiff was employed by the defendant to perform the labor sued for.—Swanstrom v. Muskegon Imp. Co., 91 Mich. 367.

¶ 167. Actual knowledge by the employee, however, acquired of the change of employers, releases the former employer; and where there is some evidence of such knowledge the question of notice or knowledge is for the jury in an action for wages against such employer.—Jones v. Shafer Iron Co., 96 Mich. 98.

¶ 168. Unless it can be said that the evidence offered by plaintiff wholly fails to show a right to recover, such right is, at least, a question of fact for the jury, upon the testimony.—Chamberlain v. Detroit Stove Works, 103 Mich. 124.

¶ 169. Whether or not the statement of an employer that the salary of an employee, who had previously been hired by the month, would have to be reduced to a stated sum "for the year," and the latter's assent to the reduction, created a new contract of employment for a year, is a proper question for the jury.—Graves v. Lyon Bros. & Co., 110 Mich. 670.

¶ 170. In an action for work and labor the fact of employment by the defendant is properly left to the jury on testimony that the plaintiff was employed by the president of the defendant's predecessor, that he worked for it, that he helped to secure its right of way, the deeds to which ran in the name of the defendant and its predecessor, and evidence of a pass issued by the defendant to the plaintiff as its "employee."—Martin v. Milwaukee, Benton Harbor & Columbus R. Co., 138 Mich. 155.

¶ 171. Where in an action for overtime the employee had each month signed a payroll reciting it was in full payment for the work performed by him, but it appeared that he had at different times called to the attention of defendant's agent who had employed him to the fact that he was not receiving pay for overtime but had been assured by the agent that he would be paid for such work, the question of waiver or estoppel by signing the payroll without protest was one for the jury.—Bidwell v. Grand Trunk W. R. Co., 148 Mich. 524.

¶ 172. In an action by an employee of a railroad to recover for overtime under a contract for a named sum as monthly salary, it being agreed he should have pay for overtime, where he signed a payroll containing the clause that the stipulated salary was "in full of all demands for work during the regular and irregular working hours, up to and including the date of this payroll," but it appeared from the evidence that he spoke to the agent who had employed him at various times about his overtime, and he was assured it would be paid him, it was for the jury to say whether he in fact understood he was receiving his full pay each month.—Bidwell v. Grand Trunk W. R. Co., 148 Mich. 524.

¶ 173. Plaintiff worked in the flouring mill of defendant, under an express contract for so much per week, for several years. He married defendant's daughter in February, 1901, and his wife and he boarded with defendant. In November, 1902, defendant opened an electric light plant and plaintiff did extra work there nights and continued to work there after his employment at the flouring mill ceased. Held, there was evidence to go to the jury of an implied contract to pay plaintiff extra for the work in the electric light plant.—Middlebrook v. Slocum, 152 Mich. 286.

¶ 174. A servant engaged by defendant to manage his farm applied a portion of the proceeds upon his own claim for wages, presumably according to the intention of both parties, and failed to credit certain items to defendant until his attention was called to them. Held, this did not justify the court in saying, as a matter of law, that the servant was lacking in fidelity.—Williams v. Crane, 153 Mich. 89.

¶ 175. Plaintiff was employed by defendant as a salesman on a salary under a contract running from February 8, 1909, to December 31, 1909. On December 2, 1909, plaintiff wrote to defendant asking if his contract would be renewed, which letter was referred to one Fulton, defendant's sales manager. Plaintiff was advised that his letter had been referred to said Fulton. On December 12 and 27, 1909, plaintiff wrote letters to defendant requesting a reply to his letter of December 2. On December 30, 1909, one Booth, who had no authority to employ salesmen, requested plaintiff to examine and correct certain advertising matter. This and other services were performed by plaintiff in January, 1910. Defendant did not inform plaintiff until January 24, 1910, that his contract would not be renewed. Held, the dealings between the parties did not as a matter of law result in a renewal of the plaintiff's contract.—White v. United States Gypsum Co., 168 Mich. 238.

¶ 176. Plaintiff's testator was employed as a bookkeeper for defendant's father. Defendant and his father were interested in a corporation and plaintiff's testator kept the books of the corporation which was financially embarrassed. In a suit by plaintiff to recover of defendant for services in so keeping the books of said corporation, there was no direct evidence of a hiring of plaintiff's testator by the defendant. The testator sent defendant his bill for his services, which defendant returned with the remark that the testator had omitted to charge for drawing his breath and other active services, and that he should correct the bill and return it. Held, it was a question for the jury whether plaintiff's testator was or was not to do all the bookkeeping work in the office of defendant's father, including the work in question, without extra compensation.—McCain v. Smith, 172 Mich. 1.

¶ 177. Where the plaintiff's testimony showed that he supposed that he was hired for a definite period, and the negotiations showed that the plaintiff was seeking a permanent situation, that both parties understood that it might continue for a year, and that the compensation was fixed at a definite sum per annum, it was not error for the court to refuse to charge that there was no evidence of a hiring for a definite period, and that the verdict must be for the defendant.—Franklin Mining Co. v. Harris, 24 Mich. 115.

¶ 178. Upon the undisputed facts it was held that there was no agreement, express or implied, on defendant's part to pay plaintiff for help rendered around defendant's barn, and that a verdict was rightly directed for defendant.—Covel v. Turner, 74 Mich. 408.

¶ 179. A defense in an action against a corporation for services rendered, that plaintiff was under contract to render services for another corporation during the period in question, is not sufficient to demand a directed verdict for defendant where the other corporation involved does not raise the question, and plaintiff testifies that he had performed all of the services required by his first employer, and that its general manager authorized his employment by defendant.—Ruttle v. What Cheer Coal Min. Co., 153 Mich. 300.

¶ 180. Where in a suit to recover for services in installing an engine, the evidence of plaintiff and the admissions of defendant clearly indicated that services were rendered, and remain unpaid for, the dispute being as to the rate of wages, it is proper to refuse to direct a verdict for defendant.—Smith v. Hertz & Hosbach Co., 160 Mich. 431.

In actions for wrongful discharge, see ante § 24.

In actions for injury to servant, see post § 71.

In actions by third persons against master, see post § 81.

General law of instructions, see Instructions.

¶ 181. In an action upon a contract of employment as a salesman at an annual salary of $800 upon an estimate of $15,000 worth of goods sold, it is error in charging the jury to assume without evidence that it was expected that the annual sales would reach $15,000, the parties themselves having practically construed the contract by making and receiving payments in the ratio of these sums on the amount of actual sales.—Alberts v. Stearns, 50 Mich. 349.

¶ 182. In an action on a contract of hire a request to charge that if plaintiff had secured other employment at lower wages, and had abandoned it, he could only recover the difference between the amount sued for and the amount he would have earned under the later employment, is sufficiently covered by the instruction that he is bound to obtain other employment if he can, and that what he would earn at it must be deducted from the amount of his recovery, even if he had relinquished such other employment.—Champlain v. Detroit Stamping Co., 68 Mich. 238.

¶ 183. In an action by an employee in a grist-mill, suing for his compensation, where the evidence tends to show that the plaintiff received and used the tolls, but that the mill did little work, and that defendant knew when he employed plaintiff that the mill's earnings would be insufficient to pay for plaintiff's services, it is proper to refuse an instruction that plaintiff having received the entire proceeds of his labor, and defendant having received no benefit therefrom, the former cannot recover.—Bonner v. Runals, 76 Mich. 136.

¶ 184. Plaintiff sued defendant to recover for labor of himself and wife. He testified to an arrangement under which he took charge of defendant's farm, living in his house with him, and working on the farm, while his wife did the work in the house. He was to receive the same wages as the other men, and his wife was to be paid for the housekeeping. Defendant denied any such arrangement, and testified that plaintiff came to him and said that he was about to be married, and that he told plaintiff that if he was "going to marry any kind of a smartish girl" he could "fetch" her to defendant's house and that she could work for both of them and plaintiff could work on his own farm, and that he said he ought to know how smart she was, for they were raised together, and that no more was said. Held, that it was error to instruct the jury that if they found defendant's version of the talk to be correct they should say what that talk meant; since under defendant's version he was entitled to a verdict.—Alderton v. Wright, 81 Mich. 294.

¶ 185. Where a person contracts to do work to the satisfaction of his employer, the latter is the judge, and the question of the reasonableness of his judgment is not for the jury; and instructions which, in effect, give the jury to understand that if the employee is a competent workman he can recover his wages whether he does good work or not is erroneous.—Koehler v. Buhl, 94 Mich. 496.

¶ 186. Where the charge left it to the jury to say whether there was a contract for services payable by a commission if plaintiff should serve a year, or whether there was no agreement as to the term and an agreement to pay by commission, and further they were told that in the first case the plaintiff failing to stay the year could recover only what the services were reasonably worth; a concluding sentence, that in one case it would be according to the agreed compensation "and in the other case the question of commissions does not cut any figure," it is only what the services are reasonably worth, does not tell them that the contract price cannot be considered.—Kendall v. Chappel, 147 Mich. 709.

¶ 187. Where a plaintiff worked under an express contract in defendant's flouring mill, and later worked in addition at night in the latter's newly erected lighting plant, it was proper to instruct the jury that plaintiff was entitled for his work in the lighting plant to reasonable compensation, if he expected to be paid, and, under the circumstances, defendant should have, as a reasonable man, expected pay would be required.—Middlebrook v. Slocum, 152 Mich. 286.

¶ 188. Plaintiff in installing an engine for defendant was told to employ an assistant, and defendant agreed to allow him the usual wages of the assistant. Plaintiff testified that those wages were sixty cents an hour and sued on that basis; the assistant testified they were forty cents. Held, that in view of this, it was error for the court to instruct the jury that if they believed plaintiff's side, he had made out his case.—Smith v. Hertz & Hosbach Co., 160 Mich. 431.

¶ 189. Defendant employed plaintiff to install and repair an engine. After efforts by the plaintiff, the engine did not run properly and defendant employed another man to fix it. The evidence was conflicting as to what was the matter with the engine. In a suit for services rendered, held, it was error for the court to charge that the trouble with the engine was not connected in any way with the plaintiff's work.—Smith v. Hertz & Hosbach Co., 160 Mich. 431.

¶ 190. In a suit by a plaintiff employee on a contract of hiring, where there is testimony that plaintiff was entitled to receive cash in lieu of certain stock to be issued to him as a part of his salary, it is proper to refuse a requested instruction of defendant that there was no evidence of a conditional sale of the stock to plaintiff.—Richards v. Church Balance-Gear Co., 166 Mich. 464.

General law as to arbitration, see Arbitration.

Provisions as to arbitration of disputes through board of mediation and conciliation, see Comp. L. 1915, §§ 5564-5577.

¶ 191. Comp. L. 1897, § 563, which provides that the state court of mediation and arbitration shall, within ten days after a matter has been fully heard render a decision thereon in writing, is directory merely and a decision rendered after the expiration of the ten days is valid.—Pingree v. State Court of Mediation and Arbitration, 130 Mich. 229.

¶ 192. A submission to arbitration which stated that the parties were unable to agree upon prices for certain work and requested an arbitration, the work specified being certain steps in the manufacture of shoes, is sufficiently broad to authorize the state court of mediation and arbitration to fix the price by the piece instead of by the day or week as had been the custom, especially where testimony was received on the hearing, without objection, in relation to the scale of wages by the piece as well as by the day.—Pingree v. State Court of Mediation and Arbitration, 130 Mich. 229.

¶ 193. The court of mediation and arbitration may fix the time from which the prices it determines shall be paid earlier than the date of submission where the articles of submission are silent as to the time from which the decision shall fix the prices, and the testimony received at the hearing indicates an understanding that the prices to be fixed shall date back to a time prior to the submission when certain machines used in the work in controversy, were installed.—Pingree v. State Court of Mediation and Arbitration, 130 Mich. 229.

¶ 194. A decision by the court of mediation and arbitration fixing prices to be paid for certain work need not fix a limit to the time when such prices shall be in effect where the articles of submission themselves fix the time, since the time so fixed necessarily controls.—Pingree v. State Court of Mediation and Arbitration, 130 Mich. 229.

III. MASTER'S LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO SERVANT.

A. NATURE AND EXTENT IN GENERAL.

[Note. The treatment given to this division and the schematic arrangement thereof are explained in a note, ante, which precedes the analytical index. See that explanation.]

Liability under Federal Employers' Liability Act, see post §§ 37, 58.
Contracts limiting or releasing liability, see post § 45.
Duty to provide safe tools, appliances and places, see post § 46.
Duty to take precautions against injury, see also post § 52.
Duty to warn and instruct servant, see post § 54.
Methods of work, rules and orders, see post § 52.
Duty of master to inspect, see post § 53.
Liability for acts of fellow servants, see post § 55.
Doctrine of assumption of risk, see post § 56.
Actions for injury to servant, see post § 60 et seq.
Burden of proof as to negligence of master, see post § 62.
Jury questions as to negligence of master, see post § 67d.
General law of negligence, see Negligence.
Authority to employ medical services and nursing for injured employees, see Agency § 34.
Actionable death of servant, see Death by Wrongful Act.
Contracts to indemnify widow in case of death of servant, see also Death by Wrongful Act § 2.
Liability to workman injured on county structure while at work by reason of defect therein, see also Counties § 36.

¶ 195. When a master has done all that can be reasonably required of him, to prevent risks to his servants, he has done all that he owes them.—Smith v. Potter, 46 Mich. 258.

¶ 196. A master's liability for injuries to his servant from defective arrangements is not that of an insurer or guarantor if the defect was apparent to ordinary observation. It is a question of reasonble care and diligence in providing against it.—Batterson v. Chicago & G. T. Ry. Co., 49 Mich. 184.

¶ 197. A master is bound only to use ordinary care in protecting his servants from dangers that are not within their knowledge or observation.—Richards v. Rough, 53 Mich. 212.

¶ 198. An employer cannot be held liable as for negligence in omitting to guard against accidents that are not likely to happen.—Sjogren v. Hall, 53 Mich. 274.

¶ 199. An employer is not required to use every possible safeguard against accident to his employees from the machinery on his premises. Reasonable care is the requirement.—Lindstrand v. Delta Lumber Co., 65 Mich. 254.

¶ 200. The reduction of danger to a minimum requires the exercise of the highest degree of care attainable, and the law imposes no such duty upon the employer, but only the exercise of that reasonable care which the ordinarily prudent and careful man exercises in like or similar work.—Jungnitsch v. Michigan Malleable Iron Co., 105 Mich. 270.

¶ 201. An employer does not become an insurer by requesting his employee to incur danger in his service, unless he conceals from the employee his knowledge of, or at least fails to make known to him, a latent danger.—Welch v. Brainard, 108 Mich. 38.

¶ 202. The care which a master should employ to prevent accident is measured by the known danger.—Charron v. Union Carbide Co., 151 Mich. 687.

¶ 203. An employer who has furnished safe tools and competent workmen to select and use them has performed his full duty to his employees in the matter.—Flaws v. West Bay City Shipbuilding Co., 132 Mich. 169.

Formation and existence of relation, see ante I.
Liability of corporate successor of master, see post § 41.
Negligence of third persons, see post § 44.
Scope of employment as bearing on duty to warn and instruct, see post § 54e.
Evidence as to the relation and scope of employment, see post §§ 64a, 65a.
Jury questions as to relationship and scope of employment, see post § 67a.
In actions for injury to third persons, see post § 74.
Control of premises as test for liability of master to servant injured during work in another's building, see also Buildings ¶ 19.
Workman traveling on free ticket as passenger, see Carriers § 112.
Liability of owners of premises to railroad employees injured while switching on premises, see Independent Contractors ¶ 18.
Disability of injured servant to sue contractor who furnished machine not according to contract with master, see Contracts ¶ 1129.
Liability of successor to employing corporation, see Corporations § 213.

¶ 204. A manufacturer of nitro-glycerine contracted with a railroad company for the transportation of a quantity, and the latter requested another railroad company to move the car loaded therewith some distance over its track. The company so requested sent a switchman to perform the service, and he was killed by the explosion of a can while it was being loaded. The loading was done by employees of the manufacturer, and the switchman had no control or authority over them. He, however, knew the dangerous character of the work. Held, that there was no ground of action against the company which employed the switchman for the fatal injury to him.—Foley v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 48 Mich. 622.

¶ 205. The manufacturer of an elevator which had been in use two or three days sent an employee, at the purchaser's request, to see what was the matter with it. After taking the car to an upper floor the latter said to one of the purchasers, "Let us load it up," and the purchaser accordingly directed a servant to assist in the loading. The elevator fell while being loaded, and the servant was hurt. Held, that he had a right of action against the manufacturer, who was in possession by his employee.—Necker v. Harvey, 49 Mich. 517.

¶ 205a. Where persons under contract to dig a shaft in defendant's mine have entire charge and supervision of the work, the defendant is not liable for any injury to one of his employees caused by a defect in the contractor's apparatus of which defect contractors had notice and which it was their duty to repair.—Lendberg v. Brotherton Iron Mining Co., 75 Mich. 84.

¶ 206. In an action for personal injuries based upon the relation of master and servant, there can be no recovery where the evidence shows that plaintiff was not employed by defendant, but by a contractor, to whom defendant furnished the building and appliances about which plaintiff was employed, and who paid, and had exclusive control of, the workmen.—Reier v. Detroit Steel & Spring Works, 109 Mich. 244.

¶ 207. Where a defendant railroad company sued for damages for personal injuries had acquired the property of another company by which the plaintiff had been injured, but there was no evidence that the plaintiff knew of the transfer, and where the defendant company was in fact operating the properties at the time of the accident, it occupied the position of an undisclosed principal and is liable as master for any negligence, the matter not being so much a question of contract as of duty owed to the employees.—McClure v. Detroit Southern R. Co., 146 Mich. 457.

¶ 207a. A manufacturer, through whose yards railroad switch tracks were built, was not responsible for injuries to its servant who was struck by a switch train while working in such yards for his master, on the ground that it was the agent of such railroad company; since it had no supervision or control of the railroad company or its men, such company being an independent contractor.—Breeze v. MacKinnon Mfg. Co., 140 Mich. 372.

¶ 208. A workman who stays upon his employer's premises during the noon recess to eat his dinner is not a trespasser; he has implied permission to stay there, and if called on to resume work before the recess has expired it is his duty to do so. And whatever he does under such circumstances is within the scope of his employment, and to that extent not voluntary.—Broderick v. Detroit Union R. Station & Depot Co., 56 Mich. 261.

¶ 209. Opening a ventilator during a noon recess is not so foreign to a workman's employment that he would be justified in refusing to do it, when directed to do so by competent authority, since such opening of the ventilator, adding to the comfort of the employees while rendering service is beneficial to the employer.—Broderick v. Detroit Union R. Station & Depot Co., 56 Mich. 261.

¶ 210. A workman in a grain elevator stayed on the premises during the time allowed him for his dinner. Within that time he was ordered to aid in opening a ventilator, and, by reason of a defect, sustained injury without fault on his part. Held, that he was during such time in the employ and under the direction of his employer, and that his employer was liable.—Broderick v. Detroit Union R. Station & Depot Co., 56 Mich. 261.

¶ 211. Where a servant, whose duty it is at any time during working hours when upon the master's premises to perform the duties incident to his employment, starts to leave the premises on his private business, and is injured by the alleged negligence of the master, while upon the premises, and during working hours, he is at the time in the employment of the master, and if injured by a fellow-servant's negligence there can be no recovery.—Adams v. Iron Cliffs Co., 78 Mich. 271.

¶ 212. Where a miner directed by defendant to clean out the sump on Sunday is injured by defendant's negligence while so engaged, the mine is to that extent so in operation as to render the defendant liable, although the mine is otherwise closed down on that day.—Capeling v. Saginaw Coal Co., 156 Mich. 437.

¶ 213. A quarry laborer injured by a stone from a blast while eating his dinner on a highway during his noon hour is not a fellow-servant with the other workmen at the time of the accident.—Moronen v. McDonnell, 177 Mich. 691.

¶ 214. Where a quarry laborer is injured by a stone from a blast while eating his dinner on a highway, at a place selected by himself, during his noon hour, the relation of master and servant does not exist in the sense requisite to make applicable the fellow-servant rule, or the duties to furnish a safe place to work or to instruct.—Moronen v. McDonnell, 177 Mich. 691.

¶ 215. It is not without the scope of the employment of one employed in a car factory to do general work,—such as carrying timbers, painting, lifting, etc.,—to assist in hoisting a car upon its trucks by means of a block and tackle apparatus, especially where he has been accustomed to render such service whenever called upon to do so.—Findlay v. Russel Wheel & Foundry Co., 108 Mich. 286.

¶ 216. In an action for injuries by an employee who was employed in the woodworking department where cars were brought for repair, and the employees thereof sometimes assisted in jacking up wrecked cars when called upon, the plaintiff, who had been ordered to go into the yard and assist in the repair of a loaded freight car, and who in obeying an order was killed while in the act of getting under the car by its falling on him, cannot be said to be working outside the general scope of his employment.—McClure v. Detroit Southern R. Co., 146 Mich. 457.

¶ 217. Where plaintiff was in the employ of a company contracting to do certain work for the defendant, and was injured by falling into an unguarded hatchway, he cannot recover without showing that in the performance of the contract it was necessary for him to go in the vicinity of the hatchway.—Hutchinson v. Cleveland-Cliffs Iron Co., 152 Mich. 367.

¶ 218. Where a plaintiff is injured by going outside his usual line of work, and using a certain dangerous machine of defendant, his employer, it is error to instruct that plaintiff cannot recover unless the defendant specifically ordered him to use the machine, if, from the nature of plaintiff's employment, it might be fairly understood that he was to use the machine.—Marklewitz v. Olds Motor Works, 152 Mich. 113.

¶ 219. Where plaintiff had been employed for a considerable time in handling the logs on defendant's skidways after they had been unloaded from the cars, an order to drive the team moving the car to the different skidways, while doing which he was injured by the fall of a log, is not beyond the scope of his employment.—Hilgbrandt v. Oval Wood Dish Co., 180 Mich. 43.

¶ 219a. A village which had no control of sewer work let out under contract, except to employ an inspector whose sole duty it was to see that the tile was laid in a proper manner after the trench was dug, was not liable to an employee of the contractor who sustained injury while digging.—Lenderink v. Village of Rockford, 181 Mich. 372.

Federal Employers' Liability Act, see post § 37.

Provisions as to protecting and guarding dangerous machinery and places, see post § 51.

Warning and instructing immature servants, see post § 54d.

Care in selection and retention of servants, see post § 55b.

Infants employed in violation of statute as fellow-servants, see post § 55e.

Assumption of risk by immature employees, see post § 56d.

Statutory provisions as to contributory negligence, see post § 59a.

Omission of statutory duty as bearing on contributory negligence, see post § 59b.

Contributory negligence of minor employees, see post § 59j.

Jury questions as to violation of Child Labor Law, see post § 67e.
Workmen's Compensation Act, see Workmen's Compensation Act.
Police power to regulate for welfare and safety of workmen, see Constitutional Law § 104.
Consent to illegal employment of minor as defense in action by parents for his wrongful death, see Death by Wrongful Act § 7.

¶ 220. Under Pub. Acts 1901, No. 113, § 3, the employment of a boy under 16 at an employment whereby his life or limb is endangered constitutes actionable negligence.—Sterling v. Union Carbide Co., 142 Mich. 284.

¶ 221. To construe Pub. Acts 1901, No. 113, § 3, providing that no child under 16 shall be employed at employment whereby his life or limb is endangered, as designed to protect children from such dangers as could not be obviated by persons of mature judgment would render it nugatory.—Sterling v. Union Carbide Co., 142 Mich. 284.

¶ 222. Pub. Acts 1901, Act No. 113, prohibiting the employment of children under the age of fourteen years in any manufacturing establishment, and providing that no child under the age of sixteen years shall have employment whereby life or limb is in danger, although it does not provide a remedy for one injured by or on account of its violation, raises a duty for the benefit of persons of the classes liable to be injured, and may be enforced by such persons.—Syneszewski v. Schmidt, 153 Mich. 438.

¶ 223. In construing the statute (Act No. 113, Pub. Acts 1901), with reference to the employment of children in dangerous occupations, regard must be given to the inexperience and heedlessness of children.—Braasch v. Michigan Stove Co., 153 Mich. 652.

¶ 224. In determining whether an occupation is dangerous, with regard to a statute prohibiting the employment of children in dangerous occupations, the question is not one of the obviousness of the danger, but whether the occupation is one attended with dangers which a child would not be competent, in view of childish habits and instincts, to understand or avoid.—Braasch v. Michigan Stove Co., 153 Mich. 652.

¶ 225. Where a child under sixteen was employed in violation of Pub. Acts 1901, Act No. 113, §§ 2 and 5, he is not estopped from recovering for injuries sustained by reason of the fact that he was employed upon representations made in his hearing that papers were unnecessary in his case.—Braasch v. Michigan Stove Co., 153 Mich. 652.

¶ 226. Where a child not sixteen years of age is employed (in violation of statute requiring that as a condition to such employment there must be provided and placed on file a sworn statement, made by the parent or guardian, stating the age, date, and place of birth of such child, and that the child can read and write), without any precaution except to inquire the age of the child, and to judge from his appearance that he was telling the truth, the employer acts at his own risk, and cannot assert the statements of the child or his parents in defense to an action for injury to the child.—Syneszewski v. Schmidt, 153 Mich. 438.

¶ 227. Employment, in which a boy under the age of eighteen years was compelled to stand in a space slightly over three feet in width between moving belts, within an arm's length of revolving knives, to take boards thirty inches long, nine inches wide, and one and three-eighths inches thick, the ends of which were within six inches of the revolving knives, and carry them some distance and pile them, is hazardous within the meaning of Public Acts of 1911, No. 230.—Radic v. Thomas Jackson & Co., Ltd., 178 Mich. 618.

¶ 228. One who employs a minor and places him at work about a dangerous machine in violation of section 11, Act No. 285, Pub. Acts 1909 (How. St., 2nd Ed., § 4019), is not relieved from liability for a resulting injury by reason of the employee's misstatement of his age where the employer did not rely on such misstatement but used his own judgment in employing the plaintiff, without making any investigation as to his age.—Powell v. E. F. Stafford Mfg. Co., 183 Mich. 1.

¶ 229. A common laborer employed to clean out the still used in the manufacture of soda ash and to assist in closing the still door is not engaged at an employment endangering his life and limb within the meaning of the Child Labor Law, Act No. 113, Pub. Acts of 1901.—Antosik v. Michigan Alkali Co., 166 Mich. 415.

¶ 230. Act No. 285, Public Acts of 1909, which provides that no female under the age of twenty-one years or male under eighteen years shall be employed "in any other employment which may be considered dangerous to their lives," etc., does not so make the state factory inspector the final judge as to whether machinery is dangerous as to preclude the possibility of recovery for an injury suffered by an employee from falling into the cogs of a machine after said inspector had inspected said machine and made no order regarding the same.—Tabinski v. A. Harvey's Sons Mfg. Co., 168 Mich. 392.

¶ 231. To employ a girl sixteen years old to operate a laundry mangle equipped with adequate safety devises is not, under Act No. 285, Pub. Acts 1909, §§ 4009-4063, How. St., 2nd Ed., negligence as a matter of law.

—Great Lakes Laundry Co. v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 184 Mich. 294.

¶ 232. A judgment in favor of a girl twelve years old for the loss of her right hand while employed in operating a laundry mangle in violation of Act No. 285, Pub. Acts 1909, as amended by Act No. 220, Pub. Acts 1911, §§ 4009-4063, How. St., 2nd Ed., affirmed.—Schuetz v. Van Orman, 184 Mich. 478.

Proximate cause of injury, see post § 43.
Federal Employers' Liability Act, see post § 37.
Safety of railroad tracks, bridges and equipment, see post § 49.
Safety of mines and mining equipment, see post § 50.
Railroad employees as fellow-servants, see post § 55j.
Mine employees as fellow-servants, see post § 55p.
Risks assumed by railroad and mining employees, see post §§ 56n, 57, 58.
Contributory negligence of railroad employees and miners, see post § 59 et seq.
Pleading in actions by railroad and mine employees, see post §§ 60a, 60b.

¶ 233. The common-law liability of railway companies is not added to by Comp. L. 1897, §§ 6284, 6295, providing that no person shall be employed as a servant in any operating department of a railroad who uses intoxicating drinks as a beverage and any company knowingly employing such person shall be liable to a penalty of five hundred dollars, and providing that any person intoxicated while in charge of a locomotive running on a railroad or acting as the conductor of any train shall be liable for all damages incurred in consequence and deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, but that this does not release the railway company from liability.—Wallin v. Arcadia & B. River Ry. Co., 172 Mich. 466.

¶ 234. Act 104, P. A. 1909, How. 2nd Ed., § 4110, relating to recovery by employees of common carrier railroads for negligence of the company, its officers, agents, or employees, is constitutional.—Quick v. Detroit & M. R. Co., 175 Mich. 676; Fernette v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 175 Mich. 653.

¶ 235. Under Act 104, P. A. 1909, How. 2nd. Ed., § 4110, relating to the liability of common carrier railroads to employees for injuries, the liability intended to be created in case death results is for damages which may result to the class of persons mentioned by the act, in whose interest the action is begun.—Fernette v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 175 Mich. 653.

¶ 236. The purpose of Act 104, P. A. 1909, How. 2nd Ed., § 4110, relating to recovery by an employee of a common carrier railroad for injuries and providing that nothing shall be held to "limit the duty" of the carrier, under existing laws, is to change the common law rules as to the liability of such railroads, and not to change the measure of damages fixed by the existing law or to create any new causes of action.—Fernette v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 175 Mich. 653.

¶ 237. Act No. 104, P. A. 1909, providing that "every common carrier railroad" is liable for injuries to its employees through the negligence of the company or of its officers, agents or employees, and that contributory negligence does not bar recovery if of a lesser degree than that of the company, and that contracts, etc., of employment do not release the company, applies to street railways.—Arends v. Grand Rapids Ry. Co., 172 Mich. 448.

¶ 238. By Act No. 104, § 3, P. A. 1909, providing that the words "railroad company" as used in the act embrace any company, etc., operating or in possession of a common carrier railroad it is clearly indicated that the term "railroad company" does not apply to companies incorporated under the railroad act only but to every common carrier railroad.—Arends v. Grand Rapids Ry. Co., 172 Mich. 448.

¶ 239. Pub. Acts 1905, No. 100, § 3, providing that only competent and trustworthy engineers shall be permitted to operate the cages and hoisting devices in coal mines, imposes a positive and continuing duty upon the mine owner or operator to employ engineers such as the statute specifies, and makes him the insurer of the competency and trustworthiness of any engineer permitted to operate cages and hoisting devices in his mine. (Per McAlvay, J.; Blair, C. J., Moore and Brooke, JJ., concurring.) The owner or operator is not an insurer, but the statute prescribes a class from whom those permitted to operate cages shall be selected, and fixes a status of capability and efficiency for such officer. (Per Ostrander, J.; Grant and Montgomery, JJ., concurring; Hooker, J., dissenting.)—Layzell v. J. H. Somers Coal Co., 156 Mich. 268.

¶ 240. Under Pub. Acts 1905, No. 100, providing for the protection of coal miners, a mine operator is bound, as between himself and his servants, to employ only competent and trustworthy engineers to operate cages and hoisting devices, as required by § 3 of such act, although the mine inspector has taken no steps to penalize him for his neglect.—Layzell v. J. H. Somers Coal Co., 156 Mich. 268.

¶ 241. Section 3, Act No. 100, Pub. Acts 1905, provides "that only a competent and trustworthy engineer shall be permitted to operate cages and hoisting devices in any coal mine of this state." Plaintiff's decedent was killed while ascending in a cage operated by a fireman. Held, defendant was guilty of neglect of the duty imposed by the statute from the fact he employed a fireman instead of an engineer, and to recover, plaintiff need not prove that defendant had notice of the fireman's incompetency.—Kleinfelt v. J. H. Somers Coal Co., 156 Mich. 473.

Adequacy and excessiveness of damages under Federal Employers' Liability Act, see Damages § 243.

¶ 242. Liability of a carrier to its employees for injuries either under the state or federal law must be based on some negligent act of the employer.—Hollingshead v. Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 181 Mich. 547.

¶ 244. In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, 35 U. S. Stat. 65, plaintiff cannot recover unless he shows that he was injured through the actionable negligence of his employer.—Gaines v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 193 Mich. 398.

¶ 245. The Federal Employers' Liability Act does not make a railway company an insurer of the lives of its employees.—Miller v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 185 Mich. 432.

¶ 246. The Federal Employers' Liability Act, § 6, 35 U. S. Stat. 65, providing that no action can be maintained under the act unless commenced within two years from the day the cause of action accrued, creates a new liability, takes away the defenses formerly available, and the right of action therein created is conditioned upon its enforcement within the prescribed period, such statute not being a statute of limitations, but a statute of creation.—Bement v. Grand Rapids & I. Ry. Co., 194 Mich. 64.

¶ 247. The construction given to the Federal Employers' Liability Act by the Supreme Court of the United States is controlling in an action in the state courts based upon such act.—Jorgensen v. Grand Rapids & I. Ry. Co., 189 Mich. 537.

¶ 248. In cases brought under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, 35 U. S. Stat. 65, and amendments thereto, that statute and decisions of the federal courts upon it are controlling.—Gaines v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 193 Mich. 398.

¶ 249. The Federal Employers' Liability Act, § 6, 35 U. S. Stat. 65, providing that no action can be maintained under the act unless commenced within two years from the day the cause of action accrued, being a federal statute, must be governed in its construction by decisions of the federal courts.—Bement v. Grand Rapids & I. Ry. Co., 194 Mich. 64.

¶ 250. In view of the paramount jurisdiction of congress over interstate commerce, and thus over remedies against employers therein for injuries sustained by employees while in such commerce, the Federal Employers' Liability Act provides the exclusive remedy for at least negligent injuries to employees of interstate railroad carriers while actually engaged in interstate commerce.—Waters v. Guile, 234 Fed. 532.

¶ 251. The fact that a railroad employee, who was injured while engaged in interstate commerce, in a signed account of the accident given the railroad receivers' representative six days later, expressed the opinion that no one was to blame for the accident, and the negligence alleged in his letter refusing the receivers' offered adjustment was not asserted on appeal, would not estop him from the assertion of negligence, even though the Workmen's Compensation Act would apply if his injuries were not due to negligence, since the remedy under the Federal Employers' Liability Act is exclusive if the injuries are due to negligence.—Waters v. Guile, 234 Fed. 532.

¶ 252. The fact that employers provide medical and hospital services and medicines for an injured employee, who was injured while engaged in interstate commerce, during the first three weeks after the injury, which they are required to do by the Workmen's Compensation Act, Part II, § 4, does not estop the employee, who had abandoned a claim for compensation made under the Workmen's Compensation Act, from proceeding under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, which was the proper remedy, especially where, while such payments were made because of plaintiff's claim, defendants were not prejudiced by such payments, and an allowance for such payments would have been made in the verdict if they had not been made.—Waters v. Guile, 234 Fed. 532.

¶ 253. The Federal Employers' Liability Act, 35 Stat. L. 65, as amended by 36 Stat. L. 291, provides for two distinct actions, one for the benefit of the employee where death is not instantaneous, and the other for the benefit of certain relatives whereby they are to receive compensation for their financial loss and damage resulting from the employee's death.—Jorgensen v. Grand Rapids & I. Ry. Co., 189 Mich. 537.

¶ 254. Where an injury results immediately in the employee's death the only action maintainable is the action to compensate relatives for their financial loss because of his death.—Jorgensen v. Grand Rapids & I. Ry. Co., 189 Mich. 537.

Damages for wrongful death under Federal Employers' Liability Act, see note 7 N. C. C. A. 622-636.

Survival of employees' right of action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, see note 3 N. C. C. A. 769-770.
Distribution of recovery under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, see note 16 N. C. C. A. 724-728.
Distribution and apportionment of fruits of compromise or recovery for death or liability under Federal Employers' Liability Act where not made by jury, see note 15 N. C. C. A. 618-630.

¶ 255. In an action against a railroad company for personal injuries sustained in a collision between two trains, where it appeared that each train contained cars billed to points outside the state, the plaintiff was held entitled to recover only under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.—Fernette v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 175 Mich. 653.

¶ 256. The right of a railway employee to recover for injuries sustained while making repairs on a car owned by an interstate carrier, which was being returned after bringing a consignment of freight into this state, must be based on the Federal Employers' Liability Act (April 22, 1908, 35 U. S. Stat. 65, ch. 149), notwithstanding the defendant's line of railroad lies wholly within the state.—Gaines v. Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 181 Mich. 376.

¶ 257. An engineer on a train running between two points within a state on an interstate railroad and carrying gravel for the purpose of improving the roadbed is engaged in an act of interstate commerce so as to be within the protection of the Federal Employers' Liability Act.—Holmberg v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 188 Mich. 605. (Brooke, C. J., and Ostrander, J., dissenting.)

¶ 258. A telephone lineman employed by an interstate carrier held engaged in interstate commerce while installing new telephone wires to be used in interstate commerce so as to entitle him to sue under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.—Collins v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 198 Mich. 303.

¶ 259. One who is engaged in coaling and placing water in tanks of engines used in interstate commerce, among other duties, is engaged in interstate commerce.—Guy v. Cincinnati Northern R. Co., 198 Mich. 140.

¶ 260. In an action to recover damages for injuries sustained while plaintiff was employed by defendant as one of defendant's bonding crew engaged in cleaning and wiring the ends of the rails of defendant's railroad tracks, where defendant owned and operated its railway wholly within the state and ran no cars without or 'from without the state, but accepted freight to and from a point in another state on through bills of lading and collected charges for the full distance, held that plaintiff was at the time of his injuries engaged in interstate commerce, under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.—Cholerton v. Detroit, J. & C. Railway, 199 Mich. 647.

¶ 261. A brakeman on a train loaded with interstate freight is engaged in interstate commerce within the Federal Employers' Liability Act, notwithstanding the train in question runs only between points in the same state.—Waters v. Guile, 234 Fed. 532.

¶ 262. A railroad bridge carpenter riding on a work train carrying the equipment for repair of a bridge used by the company in interstate commerce is employed in interstate commerce, within the Federal Employers' Liability Act.—Grand Trunk R. Co. of Canada v. Knapp, 233 Fed. 950.

What employees are within the Federal Employers' Liability Act, see notes 3 N. C. C. A. 779-787; 6 N. C. C. A. 183-208; 10 N. C. C. A. 153-184; 14 N. C. C. A. 957-1011.

Liability under Federal Employers' Liability Act for negligent operation of trains causing injury to section, track, or other workmen on railroad tracks, see note 11 N. C. C. A. 342-358.

Liability under Federal Employers' Liability Act for injuries to employees other than track laborers struck by trains while on or crossing tracks, see note 11 N. C. C. A. 273-283.

Liability under Federal Employers' Liability Act for injury to or death of employee struck by train or car while crossing railroad yard or track on way to or from work, see note 11 N. C. C. A. 101-125.

Employee within Federal Hours of Service Act, see note 15 N. C. C. A. 325-343.

¶ 263. Where an employee is injured through the negligence of a railroad company, a corporation into which the former is subsequently merged is liable to the same extent as its predecessor was.—Batterson v. Chicago & G. T. Ry. Co., 53 Mich. 125.

¶ 264. A directed verdict is proper, in an action of tort for injuries against a telephone company, where the evidence shows a sale of the property of a construction company which employed the plaintiff to the telephone company, but there is no evidence of a consolidation of the two companies; or that the telephone company assumed the obligations of the construction company, and in such a case the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show the assumption of obligations by the defendant.—Chase v. Michigan Tel. Co., 121 Mich. 631.

Doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, see also post § 63a.

Evidence as to the cause of injury, see post §§ 64, 65b.

Jury questions as to cause and manner of injury, see post § 67b.

Directing verdict where cause of action not shown, see post § 70a.

General law as to proximate cause, see Negligence, III.

¶ 265. Accumulation of sawdust on top of a boiler was not the proximate cause of plaintiff's fall where it appeared that he tried to climb to the top in the dark by a ladder shorter than he supposed it to be and fell in consequence, he being in a hurry to clear off the sawdust which had ignited.—Lamotte v. Boyce, 105 Mich. 545.

¶ 266. The fact that the injured boy was employed without the written permission of his parents or guardian, contrary to the provisions of How. St. § 1997c3, was not the proximate cause of the injuries received in a scuffle with another boy over possession of some bolt-nuts near a machine with uncovered gears of which the boy had full knowledge.—Borck v. Michigan Bolt & Nut Works, 111 Mich. 129.

¶ 267. The causal connection between the employment of a boy under 16 at an employment dangerous to his life or limb and an injury sustained by him is clearly the proximate cause of such injury.—Sterling v. Union Carbide Co., 142 Mich. 284.

¶ 268. A minor having an employment permit under Pub. Acts 1909, No. 285, § 10, How. 2nd Ed. § 4018, brought suit under Pub. Acts 1911, No. 220, How. 2nd Ed. § 4017, as to employing a minor under eighteen years of age at hazardous work. In improperly pushing a board through a guarded ripsaw with the hood or guard up, his hand was injured. Held, the proximate cause of the injury was plaintiff's careless operation.—Pequignot v. Germain, 176 Mich. 659.

¶ 269. Where an employee was injured through falling into an unguarded trapdoor in a platform over which he was carrying a box of shavings, it is not a sufficient defense to show that a fellow-servant who carried the forward end of the box saw the open trapdoor and should have given warning, since it cannot be said that the failure of the employer to guard the opening or to give warning thereof did not contribute to the injury.—Hayes v. Frederick Stearns & Co., 130 Mich. 287.

¶ 270. It cannot be said that the absence of a guard customarily kept over a belt was not the proximate cause and that the slipping of the servant on a greasy floor was the proximate cause, where in attempting to turn an air cock with a wrench he slipped and fell upon the moving belt while it was unguarded.—Swick v. Aetna Portland Cement Co., 147 Mich. 454, per Hooker and Carpenter, JJ., others concurring in the result.

¶ 271. Where a servant was injured while placing his hand between the plates of a steel press, in order to put in position a sheet of steel caught under a loose gauge attached to the lower plate, by the tripping of the press by the operator, the proximate cause of the injury was not the loose gauge, but the negligence of the operator, a fellow-servant, in tripping the press at that time.—Richards v. Michigan Pressed Steel Co., 155 Mich. 668.

¶ 272. Improper temper in a piece of steel may be regarded as a proximate cause of an injury to a servant resulting from a piece of the steel chipping off and striking him.—Potvin v. West Bay City Shipbuilding Co., 156 Mich. 201.

¶ 273. The removal of a railing surrounding an engine pit held not the proximate cause of injury to an employee falling into the pit when the bicycle which he was riding through the power room struck a loose air hose lying on the floor.—Schwager v. Saginaw Plate Glass Co., 179 Mich. 360.

¶ 274. Where an employee was injured by being caught in exposed gearing upon the breaking of a ladder upon which he was working, it was held that the failure to safeguard the gearing as required by Public Acts 1909, No. 285, and not the breaking of the ladder was the proximate cause.—Smith v. Mt. Clements Sugar Co., 179 Mich. 97.

¶ 275. The failure of factory owners to perform their statutory duty to properly guard exposed set screws in two chucks used in holding a log or bolt in place for shaving in a rotary veneer peeler, and not the failure of the workman to select a chuck which had no projecting set screws, is the proximate cause of an accident to a workman injured as a result of his clothing becoming caught on such set screws while the machine was in motion, where he used chucks of the proper size for the work and which were furnished for the purpose.—Edward v. Grand Haven Basket Factory, 187 Mich. 505.

Declaration in actions by railroad and mine employees, see post §§ 60a, 60b.

Jury questions as to cause of injury to railroad employees, see post § 67b.

Jury questions as to contributory negligence of railroad and mine employees, see post §§ 68e, 68f.

¶ 276. The crushing of a switchman between cars loaded with logs projecting so far that only a five-inch space remained when they came together cannot be ascribed for cause to the neglect of the fireman in transmitting backing signals to the engineer, since no care in making train movements would have made it possible to have avoided the injury.—Catlin v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 66 Mich. 358.

¶ 277. The absence of lights upon a reopened switch, which has been left unlocked by a trespasser or fellow employee of plaintiff, is as much the proximate cause of injury to an engineer of a derailed train as the turning of the switch rails.—Town v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 84 Mich. 214.

¶ 278. A brakeman who had assisted in loading logs on a logging train was injured by the train's being wrecked because of a log falling from one of the cars. The accident happened either from the loosening of a stake carelessly put in or from the jolting of the train, which was running over a rough road at a rate of speed higher than the rules allowed. Held, that in either case the negligence of plaintiff or of his fellow-servants was the proximate cause of the accident, and that there could be no recovery.—Conger v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 86 Mich. 76.

¶ 279. The fact that a box drain, which had been constructed to carry off the water, had frozen up, thus permitting the water to accumulate and freeze over the rails, cannot be said to have been the proximate cause of the accident, as distinguished from a defective construction of the track, since the adequacy of the drain in view of probable conditions was one of the questions entering into the determination as to whether a reasonably safe place had been provided.—Balhoff v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 106 Mich. 606.

¶ 280. In an action for injury to a section hand caused by a step projecting from a caboose striking a new tie placed too near the track and throwing it against plaintiff, it cannot be argued that the injury to plaintiff was evidence that the railroad should have apprehended the danger from the projecting step, since the injury did not result from the step but from the tie being placed too near the track.—Turner v. Detroit S. R. Co., 137 Mich. 142.

¶ 281. Where a railroad employee was injured while riding on the pilot of the locomotive and the accident was caused by a defect in the pilot, bringing it too low, he is not barred from recovery by the fact that a defective turntable of which he had knowledge contributed to the injury when the pilot struck it.—Barschow v. Lake Shore & M. S R. Co., 147 Mich. 226.

¶ 282. Defendant railroad failed to provide an automatic coupler, as required by Act No. 234, Pub. Acts 1907, for a car the center of whose coupling was 27¾ inches above the top rail. The plaintiff in attempting to couple this car with another whose coupling was only 25 inches above the top rail, was injured. Held, it could not be said as a matter of law that the violation of the statute was not the proximate cause of the injury.—Betterly v. Boyne City, G. & A. R. Co., 158 Mich. 385.

¶ 283. The contract between defendant railroad and its switchmen provided that the car men should do the work of cutting off passenger coaches. Plaintiff's decedent at the direction of the yard conductor attempted to cut off a coach and was killed. Held, the defendant's failure to have the hose cut by car men was the proximate cause of the decedent's injury.—Baker v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 169 Mich. 609. (Stone, Brooke, Ostrander and Steere, JJ., dissenting.)

¶ 284. Where plaintiff employed as a brakeman on defendant's train is injured by a collision, the defendant is not liable where a mist or fog is the proximate cause of the injury.—Murphy v. Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co., 175 Mich. 216.

¶ 285. In an action for personal injuries sustained by a conductor in a switch yard in being caught between a moving car and a pile of weights near the track after his lantern had been extinguished by the wind, it was held that the proximate cause of the injury was not the extinguishment of the alleged defective lantern but that it was caused by plaintiff's own act in walking towards the approaching car.—Charters v. Industrial Works, 179 Mich. 1.

¶ 286. In an action by a suburban railway employee who was injured by the car on which he was being transported running into an open unguarded switch which had been opened by the act of a third person, it could not be said that the failure to provide lights or locks was not the proximate cause of the injury.—Noe v. Rapid Ry. Co., 133 Mich. 152.

¶ 287. In an action for injuries sustained by a motorman in a collision of his car with another car which was backing up as the result of the derailment of a car ahead, a worn rail claimed to have been the cause of such derailment, was not the proximate cause of the injury.—Seccombe v. Detroit Elec. Ry., 133 Mich. 170.

¶ 288. The master maintaining a platform in a mine shaft was bound so to construct the platform that it should be capable of withstanding the strain to which the ordinary operations of the mine would subject it; and if the platform became loosened under the strain of such ordinary operations, by reason of defects in the original construction, the company would not be entitled to have the operations themselves treated as an intervening cause of injuries to a workman under whom it gave way.—Smizel v. Odanah Iron Co., 116 Mich. 149.

¶ 289. The failure to inform an employee of a danger not to be apprehended cannot be said to be the cause of an injury.—Sommers v. Standard Min. Co., 146 Mich. 111.

¶ 290. Defendant mine owner in constructing a ladder into an exploration shaft left out a round in the same. While plaintiff employee was descending into said shaft in a bucket lowered by a cable, the pump boy in going down said ladder fell through the space left by said missing round, struck said bucket, and knocked plaintiff off. Plaintiff fell to the bottom of the shaft and was injured. Held, the negligence of the defendant in the construction of said ladder was the proximate cause of the accident.—Menere v. Copper Range Consol. Co., 169 Mich. 367.

¶ 291. Where a miner was injured by coming in contact with an exposed electric wire on the side of a narrow passage in a mine, to which he stepped in his excitement on meeting a moving car, the proximate cause of his injury was not his fright or excitement, but rather the negligence of his employer in not covering the exposed wire.—Hazzard v. Consolidated Coal Co., 183 Mich. 363.

¶ 292. Where a trammer was injured by the negligence of a fellow-servant while assisting in replacing a defective tram car on a track, the latter's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, and not the defect in the car which permitted it to jump the rails, which the employer had promised to repair.—Sabela v. Newport Min. Co., 184 Mich. 676.

¶ 293. A contractor for the woodwork on a building is not liable for the act of the servant of the masonry contractor in allowing a brick to fall injuring the servant of the woodwork contractor, though the latter sent such servant to work in the place where he was hurt, if there was at the time nothing to indicate that anything would be thrown down.—Penner v. Vinton Co., 141 Mich. 77.

¶ 294. Where a person whose negligence has caused an injury, has contracted only for results, and is independent and free from direction or restraint in the performance of his obligation, the rule of independent contractor applies and the superior is not liable.—Wright v. Bid Rapids Door & Blind Mfg. Co., 124 Mich. 91.

§ 45. Contracts limiting or agreeing to release liability.

¶ 295. An employer can relieve himself by contract from liability for negligence only by an express stipulation.—Cottrell v. Michigan United Traction Co., 184 Mich. 221.

¶ 296. A waiver by contract of liability for negligence must be plainly expressed.—Cottrell v. Michigan United Traction Co., 184 Mich. 221.

¶ 297. Whether an employment is within the terms of a contract relieving an employer from liability for negligence is a question of law.—Cottrell v. Michigan United Traction Co., 184 Mich. 221.

¶ 298. A contract releasing an employer from liability for negligence covers only such claims as were within the contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was entered into.—Cottrell v. Michigan United Traction Co., 184 Mich. 221.

¶ 299. A stipulation in an application for employment as driver of an express wagon within a designated city, exempting an express company from liability for injuries received by the applicant while in its employ, does not extend to and include his subsequent employment as a railway express messenger.—Cottrell v. Michigan United Traction Co., 184 Mich. 221.

¶ 300. The words "I understand that I may be required to render services for the company on or about the railroad, stage and steamboat lines used by the company for forwarding property," in a printed form of application for employment exempting an express company from liability for injuries sustained by an applicant while in its employ, have reference only to the particular employment sought, and when applied to a person employed as driver of an express wagon within a designated city, do not extend to and include his subsequent employment as a railway express messenger.—Cottrell v. Michigan United Traction Co., 184 Mich. 221.

B. TOOLS, MACHINERY, APPLIANCES AND PLACES TO WORK.

Railroad tracks, bridges and equipment, see post § 49.
Mines and quarries, see post § 50.
Protecting or guarding dangerous machinery and places, see post § 51.
Master's nonperformance of duty as bearing on assumption of risk, see post § 56f et seq.
Omission of duty of master as bearing on contributory negligence, see post § 59b et seq.
Burden of proof as to negligence of master, see post § 62.
Evidence as to safety and sufficiency of tools, appliances and places, see post §§ 64b, 65d.
Jury questions as to sufficiency of appliances, tools and places, see post § 67f.
Instructions as to tools, appliances and places to work, see post § 71.

¶ 301. An employer must furnish a suitable place in which his servant, with due care, may do his work without exposure to dangers that are not usual to his occupation as ordinarily performed.—Swoboda v. Ward, 40 Mich. 420; Smith v. Peninsular Car Co., 60 Mich. 501.

¶ 302. An employer is negligent if he fails to furnish a safe place for his employees to work in, and safe appliances or tools with which to do the work.—Palmer v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 87 Mich. 281; Tangney v. Wilson & Co., 87 Mich. 453; Sweet v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 87 Mich. 559; Schlacker v. Ashland Iron Mining Co., 89 Mich. 253.

¶ 303. As between the employer and his employees it is the duty of the former to furnish suitable machinery and to see not only that it is suitable, but that it is kept in repair for the employee's safety; and he is bound to use reasonable care to prevent accidents.—Johnson v. Spear, 76 Mich. 139.

¶ 304. The employer must furnish a suitable place where the servant, with due care, may perform his work without being exposed to any but the ordinary dangers of his occupation.—Kaukola v. Oliver Iron Mining Co., 159 Mich. 689.

¶ 305. It is the duty of an employer to provide his employees with a safe place in which to work.—Baucino v. Fitzpatrick, 186 Mich. 1.

¶ 306. The obligation on the part of the master to provide a safe place is not imposed where dangers arise by reason of changing conditions in the progress of the work.—Dunn v. Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co., 161 Mich. 551.

¶ 307. It is the master's duty to furnish adequate steam capacity to make the operation of machinery reasonably safe.—Burgess v. Humphrey Bookcase Co., 156 Mich. 345.

¶ 308. An explosion of calcium carbide caused by water coming in contact with it from a steam pipe which was being repaired, is one which should have been anticipated, and precautions taken to prevent, where the carbide was in an elevator pit and defendant had knowledge of such fact, and that the floor was so constructed that water falling on it would reach the pit, that sparks were produced in the elevator, and that the combination of water, carbide, air and a spark will produce an explosion.—Charron v. Union Carbide Co., 151 Mich. 687.

¶ 309. The fact that an electric light and telephone company is about to change the entire construction of its poles and lines does not make its duty less imperative to protect its linemen from dangers arising from original faulty construction of said lines and from faulty repairing of same prior to the date of the accident in question.—Huber v. Twin City General Electric Co., 168 Mich. 531.

¶ 310. It is the duty of an automobile company to furnish its foreman, who is required to test cars upon a track built by the company, with a reasonably safe place or instrumentality on which to perform his services.—Blick v. Olds Motor Works, 175 Mich. 640.

¶ 311. Where as the result of installing new machinery in a factory, chipping of pieces of iron therefrom with a cold chisel had continued for two weeks without any precaution being taken to prevent the injury to other employees from flying chips, and a servant not employed in such work while passing was struck in the eye by a flying chip, the doctrine of safe place applies.—Webb v. Buick Motor Co., 182 Mich. 551.

¶ 312. The doctrine of safe place extends to a trench in which an employee who had no part in making the place where he was working, was engaged in enlarging the trench about the ends of water pipes so as to permit the calking of the joints.—Baucino v. Fitzpatrick, 186 Mich. 1.

¶ 313. It is the duty of the proprietor of a hairdressing and manicuring establishment operated on the first floor and basement of a building to furnish one employed as a scrubwoman with a reasonably safe place to work and to keep a flight of stairs customarily used by employees in going to and from the basement adequately lighted and in good condition for the easy and safe passage of employees.—Wulff v. Bossler, 199 Mich. 70.

¶ 314. The employer must use due care in furnishing suitable instrumentalities for the performance of the work required; and for an omission, whether from his own want of care or for that of a fellow-servant of the person injured, he is liable.—Gardner v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 150 U. S. 349, 37 L. ed. 1107, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 140.

Delegation of duty to inspect and repair, see post § 53a.

Delegation of duty to warn and instruct, see post § 54a.

¶ 315. A master cannot shift his duty to furnish his servants a safe place to work upon by appointing a foreman with full authority to choose the material and direct the construction of the scaffold on which such servants must work.—Brown v. Gilchrist, 80 Mich. 56.

¶ 316. The duty of a master to use reasonable care in providing safe tools and appliances for the use of workmen in its employ cannot be delegated to another so as to relieve the master from personal liability.—Morton v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co., 81 Mich. 423.

¶ 317. An employer's duty to provide a safe place for his servants to work in is a nondelegable one.—Balhoff v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 107 Mich. 591; Ranta v. Newport Min. Co., 180 Mich. 459; McBrown v. B. Siegel & Co., 175 Mich. 186; Maki v. Isle Royale Copper Co., 180 Mich. 624; Scoop v. W. H. White Co., 182 Mich. 539.

¶ 318. The primary duty of a railroad company to provide cars reasonably safe and in reasonably good condition for the purposes for which they are to be used, is one which cannot be delegated.—McLean v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 137 Mich. 482.

¶ 319. Since an employer's duty to provide a safe place is nondelegable, the character and competency of the person employed to perform the duty is immaterial, except in so far as it may throw light on the question whether the master's duty was performed.—Scoop v. W. H. White Co., 182 Mich. 539.

¶ 320. An employer cannot relieve himself from liability for an injury to an employee by delegating to a subordinate his duty of providing his employees with a safe place in which to work.—Baucino v. Fitzpatrick, 186 Mich. 1.

¶ 321. It is the duty of a master to furnish his servant with a reasonably safe place to work and with reasonably safe appliances, and he cannot delegate this duty so as to relieve himself of responsibility.—Gillette v.

Grand Trunk Western Ry. Co., 192 Mich. 113.

¶ 322. Where a steam-fitter engaged in making repairs in a steam pipe, allowed water to escape therefrom and come in contact with calcium carbide, whereby an explosion was caused and plaintiff's intestate was killed, there being nothing in the position of the steam-fitter and plumber which would cause him to know the conditions under which an explosion might occur, held, that the duty to cause the water to be removed from the steam pipe before instructing the plumber to do the work which necessitated the breaking of the pipe, devolved absolutely upon the master, and was nondelegable.—Charron v. Union Carbide Co., 151 Mich. 687.

¶ 323. A master is responsible for the negligence of its blacksmiths to whom it has committed the duty of furnishing safe tools to its employees.—Potvin v. West Bay City Shipbuilding Co., 156 Mich. 201.

¶ 324. As regards the duty of the master to furnish a safe place to work it does not matter whether the order or direction resulting in plaintiff's injury is given by the superintendent or a foreman, for the duty to furnish a safe place in which to work is one which cannot be delegated by the master.—Orso v. Great Lakes Engineering Works, 164 Mich. 568.

¶ 325. The duty to repair and keep the place and appliances used in and about a business reasonably safe rests upon the employer and is nondelegable.—Courtois v. King Paper Co., 172 Mich. 305.

¶ 326. Where a miner working in the bottom of a shaft was injured by the fall of timber from a staging higher in the shaft, where timbermen were engaged in timbering the walls of the shaft, it was held that the duty of carefully constructing the staging and working thereon was not a nondelegable duty.—Kaaro v. Ahmeek Mining Co., 178 Mich. 661.

¶ 327. An employer's duty to protect his employees from exposed electric wires cannot be delegated so as to relieve the former from liability for injuries sustained by an employee by coming into contact with such wires.—Hazzard v. Consolidated Coal Co., 183 Mich. 363.

Evidence as to, see post §§ 64b, 65d.
Questions of law and fact, see post § 67f.

¶ 328. Masters do not impliedly warrant the machinery and appliances used by their servants to be safe beyond any contingencies or even to be as safe as those of other employers.—Richards v. Rough, 53 Mich. 212.

¶ 329. As between the employer and his employees, it is the duty of the master to furnish suitable machinery, and see that it is kept in repair, and he is bound to exercise reasonable care to prevent accidents; which care necessarily has relation to the parties, the business in which they are engaged, the wear and tear upon the machinery, and the varying exigencies which require vigilance and attention conforming in amount and degree to the circumstances of each particular case.—Johnson v. Spear, 76 Mich. 139; Johnson v. Spear, 82 Mich. 453.

¶ 330. A master is bound to use all reasonable care in providing safe tools and appliances for the use of workmen in his employ.—Morton v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co., 81 Mich. 423.

¶ 331. A master owes the duty to a servant of using ordinary care and diligence in providing safe material and such appliances as are reasonably calculated to insure his safety.—Wachsmuth v. Shaw Elec. Crane Co., 118 Mich. 275.

¶ 332. A defendant's duty to supply safe appliances for the use of an employee is to be measured by the probability and not by the possibility that a certain device might result in injury.—Johnson v. Jackson, 168 Mich. 149.

¶ 333. In selecting and inspecting torpedoes for the signaling of trains, a railroad is bound to exercise only reasonable care, and is not required to absolutely insure their efficiency.—Siegel v. Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 160 Mich. 270.

¶ 334. An employer is not under obligation to his servants to make use of the safest or most recent mechanical appliances for the purpose of insuring the safety of his employees.—Fort Wayne, J. & S. R. Co. v. Gildersleeve, 33 Mich. 133; McGinnis v. Canada Southern Bridge Co., 49 Mich. 466.

¶ 335. Business establishments are not bound at their peril to use only the best machinery and implements and the safest methods.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Smithson, 45 Mich. 212.

¶ 336. The use of appliances which are in universal and common use for the purpose cannot be said to be negligence.—Werbowlsky v. Fort Wayne & E. R. Co., 86 Mich. 236.

¶ 337. An employer is not in duty bound to furnish his employees the safest known appliances and instruments, but he discharges his duty towards them in that respect if he furnishes appliances which are in common and general use throughout the country in the same or similar lines of work.—Shadford v. Ann Arbor St. R. Co., 111 Mich. 390.

¶ 338. A master is not required to make his premises perfectly safe and furnish the best material, his duty being discharged if he makes the premises reasonably safe.—Lockwood v. Tennant, 137 Mich. 305.

¶ 339. Where a master furnishes tools which are efficient to the extent of their capacity, and are not calculated to deceive those who use them, it is not necessary that they shall have been of the latest pattern or those best adapted to the use.—Wheaton v. Wagner Lake Ice & Coal Co., 151 Mich. 100.

¶ 340. A master is not negligent in failing to furnish his servant a place to work safe as against apparent and obvious danger.—Stone v. Bennett, 194 Mich. 441.

¶ 341. The fact that an employee had frequently ridden on his bicycle through the power room of a factory on his way to and from work, without having been forbidden to do so, does not render the master liable for failure to supply him with a safe place to ride.—Schwager v. Saginaw Plate Glass Co., 179 Mich. 360.

¶ 342. Where plaintiff's intestate was killed in a building known as the "erecting house" where there were sixteen tracks, while he was employed by the defendant painting cars and was passing between cars while going for more paint, it cannot be said that the defendant failed to perform a duty owing to decedent to provide a safe place to work and to travel on its premises in the performance of his work, when the danger of passing between cars that were liable to be moved at any moment was obvious to decedent. There was no duty to guard and protect the opening or passage left between the cars when employees were required to cross.—Jurkiewicz v. American Car & Foundry Co., 147 Mich. 622.

¶ 343. The duty of a master to provide a safe place to work does not extend so far as to require that he shall see at his peril that the machinery and appliances employed are properly used. Reasonable regulations must be made for their use; but when this is done, and the fault of one servant makes a place unsafe, which, but for such fault, would be safe, the rule of nonliability for the fault of a fellow-servant applies.—Jurkiewicz v. American Car & Foundry Co., 147 Mich. 622.

¶ 344. While a master must at his peril provide his servant with a reasonably safe place in which to work, exception is made to this rule where the unsafe place is made by the servant himself, or is created as an incident of the work being performed by the servant and his colaborer.—Scendar v. Winona Copper Co., 169 Mich. 665.

¶ 345. Where a certain scaffold had been constructed of one inch boards because planks were not available, and planks for the purpose had subsequently been furnished, the master is not liable though the workmen had failed to substitute the plank for the boards.—Lockwood v. Tennant, 137 Mich. 305.

¶ 346. A master is not guilty of negligence in furnishing one inch boards for the erection of scaffolds instead of two inch planks though the latter would be better for the purpose, where a sufficient quantity of boards is furnished so that the scaffold may be made safe by doubling.—Lockwood v. Tennant, 137 Mich. 305.

¶ 347. The safe place doctrine has no application where the master sends the servant to a place in a building to work which is safe but for the unforeseen negligence of servants of another contractor working on the same building and for whose acts defendant is not responsible.—Penner v. Vinton Co., 141 Mich. 77.

¶ 348. To hold linemen responsible for negligence in setting defective poles in the construction of a trolley line it must appear that selecting the poles was the duty of such linemen at the time of such construction and that the poles set were not first examined by special inspectors employed by the company directing such linemen.—Livingway v. Houghton County St. Ry. Co., 145 Mich. 86.

¶ 349. Plaintiff's intestate had no right of action against a city for the death of such intestate caused by the caving in of a sewer on which he was working for such city, upon the ground that due diligence was not used by the city in putting in the sheeting; where such intestate had agreed to put in the sheeting and such sheeting was put in according to the directions and under the supervision of such intestate.—Salzwedel v. City of Adrian, 145 Mich. 280.

¶ 350. It is the duty of the master to provide a safe place for his servants to work, and he cannot delegate this duty to another in such a way as to relieve himself from liability; but when the master has discharged this duty by making the place safe and it is subsequently rendered unsafe by the negligent act of a servant in carrying on the work in the place, the master is relieved of liability.—McBroom v. B. Siegel & Co., 175 Mich. 186.

¶ 351. The negligence of a workman in failing to give warning of some act about to be done by him, and which may be dangerous to a fellow-servant, does not come within the scope of the safe place doctrine.

—Mesich v. Tamarack Min. Co., 184 Mich. 363.

¶ 352. The doctrine of safe place to work is not involved in an action by a section hand for damages for injuries received by being struck by a train approaching from the rear while he was carelessly walking on the track to clean a switch of snow, as the place was safe, and was rendered unsafe only by plaintiff's careless act.—Barnhart v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 188 Mich. 537.

¶ 353. The doctrine of safe place to work had no application where a servant engaged in digging a trench along a cement wall and footing of a building that was being razed disobeyed orders of the master not to dig the trench deeper than the footing, as a result of which the concrete tilted and fatally injured the servant when he placed the handle of his shovel against his body and the blade against the concrete.—Aphoresmenos v. McIntosh, 189 Mich. 680.

¶ 354. In an action for personal injuries sustained by a woodsman, as the result of a tree falling upon him, which had been felled by workmen working in another gang near him, held that as the place at which the plaintiff was set to work was in itself safe and was made unsafe only through the act of himself or of his fellow employees and was constantly changing, the doctrine concerning the duty of a master to furnish a servant a safe place to work did not apply. —Stone v. Bennett, 194 Mich. 441.

§ 48d. Appliances or tools procured or selected by servant or coemployees.

¶ 355. Where a servant is permitted to choose tools from among those furnished by the master, the fact that he chose a less efficient tool than others that are at his disposal will not impose liability upon the master.—Wheaton v. Wagner Lake Ice & Coal Co., 151 Mich. 100.

¶ 356. A master owes the duty of furnishing proper tools and materials, but he is not bound to see to it at his peril that an employee and his fellow-servants make proper selections, or that they do not without authority procure tools from others.—Fellows v. Stevens, 170 Mich. 13.

¶ 357. The linemen who used defective poles in the construction of a trolley line are not responsible for negligence in making an improper selection of poles where it appears that the company employing such linemen failed to furnish a sufficient number of good poles.—Livingway v. Houghton County St. Ry. Co., 145 Mich. 86.

¶ 358. Plaintiff employee was injured by the giving way of a platform in a shaft, while engaged with other employees of the defendant in walling up the shaft. The platform was built to aid in the process of walling up the shaft from one level to another. Held, that if the planks furnished were of a species of wood which by its very nature was unfit for the purpose for which it was used, having reference to defendant's usual plan of construction, of which unfitness plaintiff was unaware, he was entitled to recover; but if, however, the timber furnished was of a suitable species, and sufficient sound planks were furnished, the defendant would not be liable for mistakes or negligence in selection, since the employees making such selection would be fellow-servants of the plaintiff.—Risku v. Iron Cliffs Co., 163 Mich. 523.

¶ 359. Defendant sent his foreman and a gang of men of which plaintiff was one, to install a sprinkler system in a manufacturing plant belonging to a third person. Defendant supplied step ladders to be used in the work. There was evidence that the foreman directed plaintiff to use a ladder found in the building, belonging to a third person, but no evidence that the foreman had any authority, general or special, to borrow and use tools in the place of those furnished by the defendant. While using said ladder plaintiff was injured on account of its alleged defects. Held, defendant was not liable for failure to supply proper tools and appliances.—Fellows v. Stevens, 170 Mich. 13. (Bird, J., dissenting.)

Instruction as to, see post §§ 71a, 71b.

¶ 360. An employee cannot bring an action against a railroad company upon the obligation which it owes the public to keep its track in safe and suitable condition, and to run its trains with regularity and dispatch for the carriage of passengers and freight.—Henry v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 49 Mich. 495.

¶ 361. The responsibility of a railroad company to its employees for the condition of its road is less strict than it would be to strangers; and an accident to an employee, involving no liability, might, if it happened to another person, cause an actionable injury.—Batterson v. Chicago & G. T. Ry. Co., 53 Mich. 125.

¶ 362. The rule that the master owes to the employee the duty of furnishing a reasonably safe place to work, applies to railroads as well as to other places.—Pahlan v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 122 Mich. 232.

¶ 363. The test of negligence in railroading is: "What is usual in railroading?"—Pahlan v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 122 Mich. 232.

¶ 364. A railroad company is not under obligation to its servants under all circumstances to make use of the safest known appliances and instruments, so as to make it responsible for failure to discard what is not such, and to supply its place with something safer.—Fort Wayne, J. & S. R. Co. v. Gildersleeve, 33 Mich. 133.

¶ 365. A railroad company is required to use due care to provide materials, machinery and other means by which an employee is to perform his work, safe for his use, and to keep them in repair and order, so as not unnecessarily to expose him to danger.—Hewitt v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 67 Mich. 61.

¶ 366. Where a brakeman was thrown from a car and injured by the breaking of a brake-chain due to the parting of a link which was not properly welded, and the defect in which might have been discovered by close examination, the company was liable for providing such a chain; and that, as the defects in the chain existed when it was put on the car, notice thereof to the company need not be proved.—Morton v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co., 81 Mich. 423.

¶ 367. A railroad company cannot be said, as a matter of law, to be negligent in using, in the unloading of freight, a gang-plank of the same character as it has used for fifteen years without accident.—La Pierre v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 99 Mich. 212.

¶ 368. A street railway must furnish those appliances and means which "measured by the standard of good railroading as actually conducted, can be said to be reasonably safe."—Mayer v. Detroit, Y., A. A. & J. Ry., 142 Mich. 459.

¶ 369. The construction of a freight shed in accordance with the general plan of such buildings, with doors too narrow to permit an employee to stand in safety beside refrigerator cars with open doors while being placed within the shed, which causes the death of an employee, does not constitute negligence which will render a carrier liable under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.—Miller v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 185 Mich. 432.

§ 49a. ——Tracks, sidings and switches.

¶ 370. A railway company's duty to the public to keep its track in safe and suitable condition, and run its trains with regularity and dispatch for the carriage and transportation of passengers and freight, is not owed to its employees and is not the measure of negligence towards them.—Henry v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 49 Mich. 495.

¶ 371. The law does not impose upon a railroad company the absolute duty of keeping the tracks in reasonable safe condition but requires reasonable watchfulness and care in inspecting tracks and in keeping them safe for employees.—Culver v. South Haven & E. R. Co., 138 Mich. 443.

¶ 372. A railroad company is not bound to block its frogs, particularly if it does not appear that in doing so it would not entail greater dangers than it would avert.—McGinnis v. Canada Southern Bridge Co., 49 Mich. 466.

¶ 373. Whether How. St. § 3397a, requiring railroad companies so to adjust, fill or block the frogs, switches and guard-rails on their roads as to prevent the feet of employees from being caught therein, applies to "split switches," so called, which were not in use at the time of the passage of said act, quære.—Grand v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 83 Mich. 564.

¶ 374. The duty imposed upon railroad companies by How. St. § 3397a, so to adjust, fill, or block the switches on their roads as to prevent the feet of employees or other persons from being caught therein, is not satisfied by the adoption of a method which the use of the road renders ineffectual within two or three days.—Eastman v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 101 Mich. 597.

¶ 375. A brakeman may rightfully assume that the employer has performed its statutory duty (§ 6313 Comp. L. '97, How. 2nd Ed., § 6670), of blocking switches, frogs and guard rails.—Scott v. Boyne City, G. & A. R. Co., 182 Mich. 514.

¶ 376. A suburban railway company is not obliged to provide targets, lights and locks at a switch in the highway, where it showed that it observed the same care in that regard as was exercised by other electric companies; it need not take all precautions which are taken by steam railroads against the result of a misplaced switch on a private right of way.—Noe v. Rapid Ry. Co., 133 Mich. 152.

¶ 377. It seems that there is no duty as a matter of law to ballast tracks evenly so to afford a smooth surface without depressions between the ties so as to make a safe place for brakemen to work.—Ragon v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co., 97 Mich. 265.

¶ 378. It is negligence on the part of a railroad to leave a hole between ties whereby a brakeman is injured by walking between moving cars.—Jarvis v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 128 Mich. 61.

¶ 379. A railroad company is not negligent in omitting to clear snow and ice from the ground alongside its track, even in the neighborhood of depot platforms; and a brakeman suddenly called to supper, who is injured in consequence of slipping on the ice, has no remedy against the company.—Piquegno v. Chicago & G. T. Ry. Co., 52 Mich. 40.

¶ 380. A railroad company is not bound to change its manner of using its sidetracks, or to adopt the most approved ways or appliances in business.—Hewitt v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 67 Mich. 61.

¶ 381. Constructing and maintaining a sidetrack so near a building in its yards and under its control as to endanger the lives of employees switching cars on said track is a violation of a railroad company's duty to provide a safe place for its employees to work in.—Sweet v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 87 Mich. 559.

¶ 382. Where plaintiff's intestate was killed by a car which had jumped a sidetrack while passing over a switch, held that there could be no recovery, because the defendant owed no duty to the deceased to keep its tracks and switches in the yard in good condition or repair so that its trains and cars would safely pass the switches and sidetracks upon which it was intended to run or shunt cars, unless it should appear that the defendant was guilty of gross carelessness or recklessness in handling and running its cars; railroad companies not being held to the same degree of care in maintaining their sidetracks as in the care of their main tracks.—O'Donnell v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co., 89 Mich. 174.

¶ 383. A railroad company which, without necessity, locates telegraph poles so near to the track over which its employees are required to operate its trains as to render it unsafe for such employees to operate the trains in the ordinary way without meeting with injury from such structures, has failed in its duty to provide a safe place.—Potter v. Detroit & G. H. & M. R. Co., 122 Mich. 179.

¶ 384. A railroad company is not required to keep its sidetracks absolutely even and smooth between the ties; they may be used without ballast and the company will not be liable to an employee who falls in consequence thereof, if he was familiar with the condition and made no objection.—Miller v. Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 133 Mich. 564.

¶ 385. The fact that a railroad fails to comply with an order of the railroad commissioner requiring it to erect an interlocking and derailing switch at a crossing, cannot be availed of as constituting negligence by an employee injured during a collision of trains on the same track and not on the intersecting tracks.—Mellish v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 167 Mich. 86.

¶ 386. Where plaintiff's intestate, a brakeman, was killed by being caught between a derailed car and a pile of lumber, no negligence of the railroad company defendant can be predicated upon the location of the pile of lumber where it was piled at the usual and convenient distance from the track.—Anderson v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 168 Mich. 207.

¶ 387. The rule protecting railroad employees from structures upon the right of way too close to the track does not apply to roundhouse doors.—Hollingshead v. Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 181 Mich. 547.

¶ 388. The rule relative to structures erected near the main tracks of a railway company does not apply to buildings within its switch yards, so far as its liability for injuries to employees is concerned.—Miller v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 185 Mich. 432.

¶ 389. The doctrine requiring the master to furnish a safe place to work applies to a railroad siding built in a shed belonging to a brick company and the railroad company is liable for injuries sustained by a brakeman caused by the roof of the shed falling through apparent faulty construction or lack of repair.—Doyle v. Toledo, S. & M. R. Co., 127 Mich. 94.

¶ 390. The discretion of a railroad company as to the sharpness of the curves it shall use in its freight depots and yards, where the safety of passengers and the public is not involved, cannot be interfered with by the courts in determining the company's obligations to its employees.—Tuttle v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 122 U. S. 189, 30 L. ed. 1114, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1166.

§ 49b. ——Bridges and culverts.

¶ 391. Railroad companies may use their own discretion as to what kind of bridges they will use, and when and under what circumstances they will remove or replace them, while they are safe.—Illick v. Flint & Pere Marquette R. Co., 67 Mich. 632.

¶ 392. The width between the trusses of a railroad bridge is of no concern to a brakeman whose duty does not require him to occupy a place of danger while passing over it.—Illick v. Flint & Pere Marquette R. Co., 67 Mich. 632.

¶ 393. A railroad company owes no duty to its employees to make use of the latest improvements in bridges, or to change the structures upon its road so as to conform to the most recent ideas upon such subjects. Accordingly it was not negligence to have a bridge less than usual width but otherwise safe.—Illick v. Flint & Pere Marquette R. Co., 67 Mich. 632.

¶ 393a. A railroad company owes no duty to its employees to build fences from its cattle-guards to the line fence, in order to advise them of the presence of such guards, —especially where the guard is plainly visible, and is located at a place where, by common experience, it may well be expected. —Fuller v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 108 Mich. 690.

¶ 394. An engineer injured by a collision in which a flat car struck the corner of the tank on the tender of his engine, raising it and "slewing" it around against the cab wherein he was, cannot recover where the only negligence charged was failure to fasten properly the tank to the frame upon which it rested, and where the testimony failed to show that for all practical purposes the fastening was not secure.—Preston v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 98 Mich. 128.

¶ 395. The duty of a railroad company to furnish cars reasonably safe and in reasonably good condition for the purpose for which they are to be used, is not performed by furnishing a car designed, suitable and safe for one purpose, to be used for another for which it is unsuitable and unsafe.—McLean v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 137 Mich. 482.

¶ 396. By "good railroading" is not meant "that everything should be done possible in equipping a car to insure safety," ordinary care being the proper rule applicable.—Mayer v. Detroit, Y., A. A. & J. Ry., 142 Mich. 459.

¶ 397. A street railway is not guilty of negligence in failing to supply its cars with sand boxes, where there is no evidence that they are essential for safety in running cars, nor is it shown that it was the custom of other roads similarly situated and running similar cars to use them.—Mayer v. Detroit, Y., A. A. & J. Ry., 142 Mich. 459.

¶ 398. Under Act No. 234, Pub. Acts 1907, logging trains having any cars the center of whose couplings is 27¾ inches above the top of the rail must be equipped with automatic couplers.—Betterly v. Boyne City, G. & A. R. Co., 158 Mich. 385.

¶ 399. Where the coupling devices on two freight cars enable the brakeman to uncouple them from either side without going between them, they sufficiently comply with the requirements of Comp. L. '97, § 5511, although the lever on each car extends only to one side so that different levers are used in uncoupling from different sides.—Wight v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 161 Mich. 216. (Moore, J., dissenting.)

¶ 400. Under a statute providing that no freight car shall be run unless furnished with safety couplers, the test of compliance with the act is not whether a device is provided, but whether the cars can be coupled and uncoupled by its use.—Wight v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 161 Mich. 216.

¶ 401. A railroad company is bound to furnish for its employees reasonably safe locomotives, and reasonably safe appliances thereto, and a competent engineer and fireman, though it is not required to furnish the best machinery or men that can be procured. —Lyttle v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 84 Mich. 289.

¶ 402. Where defendant's cars have slipped on a certain grade and run away on previous occasions, and these accidents were reported to the superintendent, the defendant is negligent if it fails to make all reasonable effort to prevent a recurrence of the dangers. —Mayer v. Detroit, Y., A. A. & J. Ry., 152 Mich. 276.

Statutory provisions as to mine employees, see ante § 36.

Mine employees as fellow-servants, see post § 55p.

Assumption of risks by mine employees, see post § 56n.

Contributory negligence of mine employees, see post § 59g.

Pleading in actions by mine employees, see post § 60b.

Jury questions as to sufficiency of appliances, tools and places, see post § 67h.

Jury questions as to knowledge and assumption of risk, see post § 67t.

Jury questions as to contributory negligence of mine employees, see post § 68e.

¶ 403. The doctrine of safe place and nondelegable duty does not apply to a place while in process of construction and being made safe.—Koskell v. Newport Min. Co., 182 Mich. 586.

¶ 404. The doctrine of safe place does not of necessity apply to work in a mine, where a servant is required to make the place in which to work.—Kochin v. Superior Copper Co., 181 Mich. 543.

¶ 405. A mine trammer cannot invoke the doctrine of safe place, where he is injured while assisting in making the place in which he has to work as mining operations are in progress.—Koskell v. Newport Min. Co., 182 Mich. 586; Zap v. Newport Min. Co., 184 Mich. 437.

¶ 406. Defendant was injured while working in an open quarry of from three to four hundred feet in length, where rock was barred or blasted down from time to time and then broken up and loaded into cars for the purpose of manufacture or shipment, as the case might be. The change which was taking place in the face of the quarry was a very gradual one. A small force of men was employed; blasting would take place at considerable intervals of time, and the place was not different from an ordinary open pit. Held, that the usual rule applicable to the duty to furnish a safe place applied.—Druck v. Antrim Lime Co., 167 Mich. 154.

§ 50a. ——Shafts, hoists and ladderways.

¶ 407. Plaintiff was injured by the giving way of a platform in a shaft. The platform was built to aid in the process of walling up the shaft from one level to another. Held, the defendant master owed the duty of supplying materials for the platform reasonably suited to the purpose.—Risku v. Iron Cliffs Co., 163 Mich. 523.

¶ 408. Plaintiff was injured by the giving way of a platform in a shaft. The platform was built to aid in the process of walling up the shaft from one level to another. Held, the master during the process of construction, with its shifting conditions, did not owe the duty of providing a safe place to work.—Risku v. Iron Cliffs Co., 163 Mich. 523.

¶ 409. The doctrine of safe place is inapplicable to a miner injured, while at work in the bottom of a shaft engaged in sinking same, by the fall of a piece of timber from a staging above him upon which timbermen were engaged in timbering the walls of the shaft, the staging being temporary in character and the conditions constantly changing as the work progressed.—Kaaro v. Ahmeek Mining Co., 178 Mich. 661.

¶ 410. An employer who negligently fails to equip a mining shaft in course of construction with a suitable signaling device to control the movements of the bucket from the bottom of the shaft, or a suitable ladder by which miners might escape in case of emergency, is answerable for injuries sustained by an employee as the result of such omissions.—Benson v. Jones & Laughlin Ore Co., 185 Mich. 7. (Brooke, C. J., and Ostrander, J., concurring in reversal on ground that negligence was not shown.)

¶ 411. The doctrine of safe place to work does not apply to a mine timberman who is engaged in putting intermediate platforms, or "sollers," between levels in the mine, the purpose of which is to stop anything falling into the mining shaft or to catch a man's body, thus putting the ladderway and shaft in a safer condition for use by those who have occasion to use them.—Drajicevic v. Champion Copper Co., 194 Mich. 306.

§ 50b. ——Drifts, raises, stopes, walls and timbering.

¶ 412. Plaintiff was employed in defendant's mine at loading upon cars and removing the ore as it was brought to the floor by the miners. As fast as the ore was removed, it was the practice to support the roof by a timbering, which was put in place by a force of men kept for that purpose, upon notification by the miners themselves or by the shift boss, who had charge of the work in the mine, subject to the general supervision of a mining captain. As the work advanced other timbers were placed on top of these as the roof was mined down. Before a newly-opened space had been timbered, and before the timbermen had been notified that their services were required, plaintiff was injured by a fall of ore from the roof. Shortly before the accident the attention of the shift boss had been directed to indications of danger, but he said that the roof was all right, and instructed the men to resume work. Held, that whether the injury was caused by excavating too large a space without placing the timbers, or whether it resulted from the fact that the timbering previously erected had ceased to support the roof by reason of the subsequent dropping of ore therefrom, thus leaving too great an area unsupported, the case was not within the rule requiring the master to provide the servant with a reasonably safe place in which to work; that the so-called "place" was a mere incident of the mining operations, the result of the common labor of those employed in the mine; and that the master's duty was discharged by the exercise of reasonable care in furnishing suitable material and employing competent men to do the work.—Petaja v. Aurora Iron Mining Co., 106 Mich. 463.

¶ 413. Plaintiff was engaged as a loader in mining gypsum. From the main passageway of the mine lateral benches or passageways were cut out as the work of mining proceeded. As these lateral benches developed, electric lights were hung along their tops. In the process of blasting and loading, these passageways were in a state of constant change. Plaintiff while loading a tram car was injured by a rock which broke away and fell on him. There was evidence that the light supplied at the place where plaintiff was working was defective and that he had complained of it, and the foreman had given directions to have it remedied. Held, plaintiff could not recover for his injury, since the defendant company owed him no duty to provide a safe place to work in the midst of constantly changing conditions.—Strepanski v. Grand Rapids Plaster Co., 162 Mich. 696.

¶ 414. Plaintiff had been working as a regular miner in defendant's mine for about three weeks. A blast was exploded in the evening in the raise in which plaintiff was working. Next morning plaintiff's assistant did not appear to timber the roof of the place blasted. Plaintiff was directed to work in another part until noon, when he was directed with another to timber the blasted place. While so engaged, a quantity of ore fell in from the roof and injured him. Held, defendant could not be held negligent on the theory of a failure to furnish a safe place to work.—Hosking v. Cleveland Iron Mining Co., 163 Mich. 538.

¶ 415. Plaintiff had been working as a regular miner in defendant's mine for about three weeks. A blast was exploded in the evening in the raise in which plaintiff was working. Next morning plaintiff's assistant did not appear to timber the roof of the place blasted. Plaintiff was directed to work in another part until noon, when he was directed with another to timber the blasted place. While so engaged, a quantity of ore fell in from the roof and injured him. Held, defendant could not be deemed negligent on the theory that it failed to furnish an assistant to enable plaintiff to timber the roof immediately in the morning of the day in question.—Hosking v. Cleveland Iron Mining Co., 163 Mich. 538.

¶ 416. Plaintiff, a timberman, was injured by the falling of rock while he was cutting a hitch in which timber called a stull was to be placed. The stulls were put in, not for the purpose of sustaining the hanging wall, but for the purpose of putting back of the stulls lagging which sustained the ore as it was broken down in the stope. Both the hanging wall and foot wall were of solid rock, and the stoping was done to remove all of the vein between these walls. Held, that the rule requiring the master to furnish a safe place to work was applicable. —Danula v. Quincy Min. Co., 166 Mich. 350.

¶ 417. Where a trammer in a mine is denied the time and privilege to pinch down the loose rock in a hanging wall, and the captain and shift boss are accustomed to look after the matter, the master is subject to the common-law duty to make the wall safe. —Scendar v. Winona Copper Co., 169 Mich. 665.

¶ 418. The doctrine of safe place does not apply to a "hitchcutter" in a mine who by reason of his peculiar skill was employed to undertake the hazardous work incident to the timbering of the mine, the dangers incident to the work changing from hour to hour as the work progressed.—Andrews v. Tamarack Mining Co., 180 Mich. 72.

¶ 419. The doctrine of safe place applies to a raise or chute in a mine having two compartments, one for conveying ore and the other to permit workmen to descend in order to loosen clogged ore by pounding with a hammer on the dividing partition.—Ranta v. Newport Min. Co., 180 Mich. 459.

¶ 420. The doctrine of safe place does not apply to a stope in a mine which miners and trammers are preparing so as to permit them to perform their regular duties.—Kochin v. Superior Copper Co., 181 Mich. 543.

¶ 421. The duty of a mine owner to furnish his employees a reasonably safe place to work extends to a passage in a mine through which the latter are obliged to travel.—Hazzard v. Consolidated Coal Co., 183 Mich. 363.

¶ 422. A timberman whose duty it is to make repairs in a mine so as to provide a safe place in which miners may work, cannot invoke the doctrine of safe place when injured in the course of his employment.—Juntunen v. Quincy Min. Co., 184 Mich. 341.

¶ 423. The doctrine of safe place is not applicable to the employment of a mine timberman, who with other members of the crew is engaged in replacing some timbers which had previously been knocked down by blasting, as the duty of such person is to make a place safe for work by others.—Vrelenich v. Calumet & Hecla Min. Co., 188 Mich. 407.

¶ 424. The doctrine of safe place does not apply where an experienced miner is engaged with other experienced miners in making the walls of a mine safe by removing old timbers from a drift and replacing them with new ones, and is injured by the falling of a stone through a hole between the top of the second set of timbers and back of the drift, which hole was due to the failure of the miners of the prior shift to use blocking.—Kangas v. Cleveland Cliffs Iron Co., 188 Mich. 255.

¶ 425. The doctrine of safe place has no application where miners are engaged in timbering up a drift so as to make it safe for passage.—Aho v. Cleveland Cliffs Iron Co., 188 Mich. 218.

¶ 426. A mine owner's duty with respect to mine timbermen is fulfilled when reasonable rules are promulgated, the workmen properly instructed, and suitable tools and material furnished for the work with competent men to perform it.—Vrelenich v. Calumet & Hecla Min. Co., 188 Mich. 407.

Duty to furnish safe tools, appliances and places, see ante § 46.

Duty of master to warn and instruct servant, see post § 54.

Nonperformance of duty as bearing on assumption of risk, see post § 56f.

Omission of statutory duty as affecting contributory negligence, see post § 59b.

Jury questions as to guards and signals, see post § 67n.

¶ 427. The statutory duty imposed upon manufacturers by Pub. Acts 1893, No. 126, §§ 11, 12, to provide certain safeguards for machinery in the discretion of the factory inspector, does not exist until the inspector has declared such safeguards necessary.—Monforton v. Detroit Pressed Brick Co., 113 Mich. 39.

¶ 428. The fact that the failure to safeguard a cornhusker as required by Act No. 124, Pub. Acts 1907, may not have contributed to an injury resulting from hazardous work, does not excuse a person under the Act when some device might have made such hazardous work unnecessary.—Garfield v. Lapham, 173 Mich. 217.

¶ 429. An ordinance of the city of Detroit requiring the laying of floors as the work of construction on buildings progresses, for the protection of workmen, is inapplicable to a contractor engaged merely in the construction of a smokestack upon the roof of a building.—Lobenstein v. Whitehead & Kales Iron Works, 179 Mich. 279.

¶ 430. An ordinance of a city as to the manner in which a contractor shall dig and protect trenches in the public streets, is for the protection of the public and not for the employees of a contractor who may be injured by the latter's failure to observe such ordinance.—Baucino v. Fitzpatrick, 186 Mich. 1.

¶ 431. The notice contemplated by How. St. § 1997c7, providing that "if * * * belting, shafting, gearing, elevators, drums, and machinery in the shops and factories are located so as to be dangerous to employees, and not sufficiently guarded, * * * after due notice of such defect, said proprietors or agents shall be deemed guilty of violating the provisions of this act," is notice by the inspector mentioned in the preceding section of the act, and until this notice is given, the statutory liability does not exist.—Borck v. Michigan Bolt Works, 111 Mich. 129.

¶ 432. The fact that a defendant employer does not cover the bolts on a revolving shaft coupling, is not negligence, by statute, but may be so in a case where he directs a plaintiff to work in close and dangerous proximity thereto.—MacDonald v. Freeman Mfg. Co., 160 Mich. 380.

¶ 433. The failure to provide the safeguards for pulleys and belts prescribed by Act No. 113, Pub. Acts of 1901, § 8, is evidence of negligence in a suit for personal injuries arising from the absence of such safeguards.—Johnson v. Union Carbide Co., 169 Mich. 651.

¶ 434. Solid emery wheels are included within Act 285, Pub. Acts 1909, providing that in any factory or workshop where wheels or emery belts of any description are in general use, fans or similar apparatus shall be provided to protect those using them from dust.—Drake v. Industrial Works, 174 Mich. 622. (Brooke, McAlvay and Ostrander, JJ., dissenting.)

¶ 435. Pub. Acts 1909, No. 285, requiring protection of gearing applies to gears situated nine feet above the floor, where it was shown that it was necessary for defendant's employees to mount a ladder several times a day to attend to a portion of their work within three feet of the exposed gearing.—Smith v. Mt. Clemens Sugar Co., 179 Mich. 97.

¶ 436. Pub. Acts 1909, No. 285, § 15, How. St., 2nd Ed., § 4023, providing that "all vats, saws, fans, planers, cogs, set screws, gearing and machinery of every description shall be properly guarded when deemed necessary by the factory inspector," held to apply in an action by a factory worker against the owners for damages for injuries received as a result of his clothing becoming entangled in projecting set screws in removable chucks used to hold in place logs for planing purposes in a rotary veneer peeler.—Edward v. Grand Haven Basket Factory, 187 Mich. 505.

¶ 437. There is no violation of the statutory duty on the part of an employer in failing to guard a revolving line shaft situated two feet from the floor of a factory at a point where there are no couplings, set screws, or projections of any kind.—Hertel v. Safety Folding Bed Co., 149 Mich. 223.

¶ 438. The language of Comp. L. 1897, § 5349, indicates a design to make the safeguarding of all gearing or belting, and the provision of loose pulleys where possible, a duty without reference to the factory inspector, although a preceding sentence in the same section makes the duty of furnishing shifters, etc., dependent upon the action of the inspector requiring it.—Swick v. Aetna Portland Cement Co., 147 Mich. 454, per Hooker and Carpenter, JJ., others concurring in the result.

¶ 439. A factory owner violates Act No. 113, Pub. Acts 1901, § 8, in failing to safeguard the pulleys and belts operating the rollers used in crushing carbide.—Johnson v. Union Carbide Co., 169 Mich. 651.

¶ 440. Plaintiff, a boy of fourteen years, was set to work on a pipe-threading machine which was operated by two sets of gears or cogs both of which were exposed. On returning to his machine from another part of the shop, plaintiff stumbled over a valve lying upon the floor and fell upon the exposed gears of said machine and was injured. Act No. 285, Pub. Acts of 1909, § 15, provides that "all gearing or belting shall be provided with proper guards." Held, the mechanism in question came within the terms of said section and defendant employer was liable for negligence in failing to safeguard the same.—Tabinski v. A. Harvey's Sons Mfg. Co., 168 Mich. 392.

¶ 441. Under Act No. 285, Pub. Acts of 1909, § 15, the language, "all gearing or belting shall be provided with proper safeguards," places upon the factory owner a positive duty to supply said safeguards, and the language in the latter part of said section to the effect that "gearing shall be properly guarded when deemed necessary by the factory inspector," does not modify the effect of the express mandate contained in the earlier part of said section.—Tabinski v. A. Harvey's Sons Mfg. Co., 168 Mich. 392.

§ 51b. ——Saws and planers.

¶ 442. The liability of a factory owner for negligence, under section 8, Act No. 113, Pub. Acts 1901, which provides that all vats, saws, planers, and other machinery shall be properly guarded when deemed necessary by the factory inspector, depends upon the fact of the order having been made by the factory inspector and brought to the notice of the owner; such an order applies not only to all machinery in use at that time but is broad enough to cover that which is installed later. —Kerr v. National Fulton Brass Mfg. Co., 155 Mich. 191.

¶ 443. Plaintiff's decedent was killed while operating a ripsaw by being struck by a piece of timber thrown back by the saw. Held, that the omission of the defendant to provide a guard for the saw, as required by statute and by the order of the factory inspector, was negligence per se.—Van Doorn v. Heap, 160 Mich. 199.

¶ 444. In an action for injuries claimed to have been caused by plaintiff's coming in contact with circular saw, failure to install a "spreader" held not negligence under evidence that spreaders are designed to prevent boards being sawed from flying or kicking back and it was not shown that there was any "fly-back" or "kick-back" at the time of the accident.—Dombrowski v. Roe-Stephens Mfg. Co., 180 Mich. 202.

¶ 445. A narrow elevated platform in a sawmill is a dangerous place for a boy thirteen years old, charged with the duty of keeping certain chutes clear of slabs by pushing or pulling the slabs with a hook or pike pole six feet long, where while giving entire attention to his work he is liable to be precipitated backward upon an uncovered, rapidly revolving shaft only a few feet distant, and the employer of the boy is liable for any injury caused by the shaft's being uncovered.—King v. Ford River Lumber Co., 93 Mich. 172.

¶ 446. A manufacturer was under no legal duty to provide guards or screens on a small saw contained on an equalizing machine, where he had left sufficient room to carry on the work around such machine and had duly instructed his employees in such work, and warned them of the dangers attending it.—Journeaux v. E. H. Stafford Co., 122 Mich. 396.

¶ 447. A wire screen over a hole in a partition built to protect a sawyer from flying sawdust is not an improper or unsafe appliance tending to obscure the sawyer's vision so as to render the sawmill owner liable for the death of an assistant at the saw in the absence of evidence to show that the vision was obscured at the time of the accident.—Kellogg v. Stephens Lumber Co., 125 Mich. 222.

§ 51c. ——Stairways, elevators, hoisting shafts and trap doors.

¶ 448. Under Act No. 285, Pub. Acts of 1909, § 14, requiring factories to provide safe stairways, it was the legislative intent to require stairways, with the safeguards specified in all cases where means of ascent and descent are needed or desired and are used by employees at their work in the line of their employment.—Davis v. Buss Mach. Works, 169 Mich. 498.

¶ 449. Under sec. 14 of Act 265, Pub. Acts of 1908, recovery may be had where an employer fails to provide a stairway with hand rails, as therein required, and the fact that no attempt to comply with the statute was made is no defense.—Davis v. Buss Machine Works, 175 Mich. 61.

¶ 450. The statute requiring stairways (sec. 14, Act 265, Pub. Acts 1908) applies to all cases where means of ascent and descent are needed or desired and are used by employees at their work in the line of their employment.—Davis v. Buss Machine Works, 175 Mich. 61.

¶ 451. Under sec. 12 of Act 285, Pub. Acts of 1909, defendants held liable for the death of plaintiff's intestate for failure to provide automatic gates for an elevator into which plaintiff's intestate fell.—Noack v. Williams, Davis, Brooks & Hinchman Sons, 175 Mich. 15.

¶ 452. If an employer's failure to inclose an elevator shaft as required by § 12 of Act No. 285, Pub. Acts 1909, How. Ann. St., 2nd Ed., § 4020, was not the actual cause of an employee's injury as he was leaving an elevator which was suddenly started by a fellow-servant, the employer is not liable where a full compliance with the section would not have prevented the accident.—Fifelski v. Grand Rapids Light Co., 181 Mich. 503.

¶ 453. Pub. Acts 1901, No. 113, § 5, making it the duty of the owner, agent, or lessee of any manufacturing establishment where hoisting shafts or well holes are used to cause the same to be properly inclosed and secured was passed with the intent to protect everybody who might be in danger of injury, and cannot be said to require only such inclosure and security as will prevent people from the outside from falling in but people inside must also be protected from the danger of falling down elevator shafts. —Murphy v. Grand Rapids Veneer Works, 142 Mich. 677.

¶ 454. The Manufacturer's Act requiring the installation of automatic gates on elevators does not apply where a company operates a gypsum mine and near it a manufacturing plant in connection with said mine, the question being whether defendant is liable for an elevator accident occurring in the shaft of the mine, said accident being attributable to the lack of said automatic gates.—Delbusso v. American Cement Plaster Co., 165 Mich. 318.

¶ 455. Trap doors are dangerous openings and when open should be properly guarded. —Hayes v. Frederick Stearns & Co., 130 Mich. 287.

¶ 456. Where an employee was injured by falling into an open trap door in a platform over which he was directed to carry a box of shavings which prevented him from seeing the floor over which he was walking, and he was not familiar with the premises, it is not a sufficient defense to an action for the injury that the buildings were new and the business just being moved in, and that the employees knew that it was not wholly completed and articles therein were not all in their proper places, it appearing that the platform in question was wholly completed and was being used for unloading goods and for a passageway for the employees in their work.—Hayes v. Frederick Stearns & Co., 130 Mich. 287.

C. METHODS OF WORK, RULES, ORDERS AND INSPECTION.

Duty, care and diligence of master, see ante § 33.
Duty to protect and guard dangerous machinery and places, see ante § 51.
Duty of master to inspect and repair, see post § 53.
Duty to warn and instruct, see post § 54.
Assumption of risk of complying with orders and commands, see post § 56i.
Assumption of risks from violation of rules and orders, see post § 56j.
Assumption of risks from improper methods of work, see post § 56k.
Contributory negligence in disregarding rules and regulations, see post § 59 l.
Evidence as to methods of work, see post §§ 64e, 65g.
Instructions as to methods of work, rules and orders, see post § 71d.

¶ 457. An employer who introduces improved and complex machinery must take such corresponding precautions to keep his employees from harm in using it as are customary with prudent men.—Swoboda v. Ward, 40 Mich. 420.

¶ 458. When the master orders the servant into a situation which may become dangerous by the starting of machinery or the act of other servants, it becomes the duty of the master to guard against such contingencies.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 459. It is the master's duty to provide the servant with a safe place to work, and, when the service required of an employee is of a particularly dangerous character, it is the duty of the master to make reasonable provision to protect him from the dangers to which he is exposed while engaged in the discharge of his duty.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 460. A quarry company using high explosives in carrying on its work must exercise reasonable care commensurate with the danger, and cover the blasts to prevent them from throwing rock or give adequate warning of expected explosions.—Moronen v. McDonnell, 177 Mich. 691.

¶ 461. A quarry company in the country is not negligent to an employee eating his dinner during his noon hour at a place of his own selection by failing to cover the blast if proper notice and warning were given.—Moronen v. McDonnell, 177 Mich. 691.

§ 52a. Methods of operating or unloading trains.

Proximate cause of injuries to railroad employees, see ante § 43.
Duty to furnish safe tracks and railroad equipment, see ante § 49.

¶ 462. A railroad company is under no legal obligation to maintain, for the protection of its employees, a station agent at a flag-station where there is an unblocked siding. All that is required of it is that it construct and equip its side tracks and cars, and station its agents, in the manner usual with well-managed railroads, and as good railroading requires.—Hewitt v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 67 Mich. 61.

¶ 463. A sectionman cannot base a right of action on the failure of a railroad to sound the statutory whistle at a highway crossing.—Lepard v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 166 Mich. 373.

¶ 464. A railroad company does not owe a section hand the duty to give statutory crossing signals.—Barnhart v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 188 Mich. 537.

¶ 465. Making "flying switches," being a practice in common use by railroads, is not negligence on their part towards an employee.—Carr v. St. Clair Tunnel Co., 131 Mich. 592.

¶ 466. Keeping a certain switch east of the crossing to which plaintiff was assigned as a crossing tender securely locked and fastened when not in use, so as to guard plaintiff from derailments, was not one of the absolute duties of defendant but one relating to the details of operation which could be properly delegated to an employee. —Dixon v. Grand Trunk Western Ry. Co., 147 Mich. 667.

¶ 467. Where the defendant railroad company had made a general order directing all car-inspectors and repair-men, before going between or under any cars, to place a red signal-flag on the end of the car or cars in the direction from which a train or engine could approach, and forbidding all train-men to back against or couple onto any car while such signal was displayed, held, that defendant was not negligent in not having a watchman or "bumpers"; nor was it negligence to run other cars upon the same track where cars were being repaired, when space was left between them, and the red flag was respected according to the rule.—Peterson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 67 Mich. 102.

¶ 468. A roadmaster directing an engineer to move an engine is not bound to see that the track is clear of all persons before communicating such order to the engineer.—Hammond v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 162 Mich. 431.

¶ 469. A railroad company is not guilty of actionable negligence in permitting its locomotives to take fuel and water upon a track without other warning to approaching trains than provided by rules requiring such trains to be on the lookout for trains taking fuel and water at such places.—Mellish v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 167 Mich. 86.

¶ 470. To require a gang of sixteen men to arrange themselves in line along a train of moving cars, and, acting as one man, to lift from the ground, and throw upon a car as it passes them, a steel rail weighing from six hundred to seven hundred pounds, and then to run fast enough along rough ground along the side of the track to be able to have the next rail in position to throw on the car at the proper moment as it passes, at least without notifying a new and inexperienced employee of the great danger attending the work, is negligence per se.—Palmer v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 93 Mich. 363.

¶ 471. It is not negligence for a railroad company to require a member of one of its section gangs to assist other employees in unloading logs from a car, and to arrange such as have fallen out of line.—Roepcke v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 100 Mich. 541.

¶ 472. A railroad company slowly moving its cars by a switch engine in its yard without sending a man in front of the cars to notify employees of their approach is not guilty of negligence as against an employee. —Aerkfetz v. Humphreys, 145 U. S. 418, 36 L. ed. 758, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 835.

§ 52b. Necessity, construction and operation of rules and regulations.

Evidence as to rules and orders, see post §§ 64e, 65h.

¶ 473. Rules promulgated by a railroad company, which define the duties of certain employees to whom the running and immediate control of trains is confided, are essentially private regulations of the railroad in the orderly and prudent conduct of its business, and do not fix the obligations and liability of the defendant to its employees, nor even to third persons; these are fixed by law, and are neither diminished nor, ordinarily, increased thereby.—Dixon v. Grand Trunk Western Ry. Co., 155 Mich. 169.

¶ 474. In an action by an employee against a railroad company for injuries sustained by being struck by a derailed train, right to recovery was based on defendant's alleged failure to see to it that the rules directing employees to keep switches locked were obeyed. Held, that plaintiff could not recover, for the existence of the rule did not add to defendant's obligations to plaintiff.—Dixon v. Grand Trunk Western Ry. Co., 155 Mich. 169.

¶ 475. One of the rules adopted by the railroad company for the guidance of engineers reads as follows: "All passenger trains will use four minutes between east switch at J. Junction and J." The preceding rule stated that signals had been erected east and west of J., and east and west of J. Junction, and directed that all trains should come to a full stop when a red signal was displayed, and not proceed until the signal had been changed. The succeeding rule declared that all trains approaching J. and J. Junction must be under full control, so as to be able to stop in case the track should from any cause be occupied, and that a sharp lookout must be kept for signals in approaching such points. Held, that the rule as to time indicated the minimum, not the maximum, time which should be used between J. and J. Junction.—Whalen v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 114 Mich. 512.

¶ 476. A rule of a railroad company requiring conductors to know that there is a reliable brake on the rear car of their train does not relieve the company from liability for injury to a freight conductor caused by the breaking of a brake chain which had been repaired by using a wire, where he had tried the brake in the usual way by setting and releasing it, and found that it worked properly, and the wire repair was below the car platform and concealed, since he had violated no duty imposed by the rule.—McDonald v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 132 Mich. 372.

¶ 477. A rule requiring a lookout on the foot-board of an engine backing across a highway is for the benefit of the public and is not available in favor of a section hand injured by a backing engine at a street crossing.—Carlson v. Cincinnati, S. & M. R. Co., 120 Mich. 481.

¶ 478. The rule requiring a lookout on the rear of a backing train cannot be said to apply to a track laborer working on the construction of a track where the train is a construction train used in the work and moved in the course thereof.—Burrman v. Grand Trunk W. R. Co., 143 Mich. 689.

¶ 479. A railroad company rule prohibiting a brakeman from entering between moving cars except under favorable conditions leaves it to the brakeman's judgment as to whether or not the footing is sufficient to warrant such action.—Jarvis v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 128 Mich. 61.

¶ 480. A book of rules of a railroad company prohibiting northbound trains from going upon the southbound main of a double track applies to engines going to roundhouses without cars attached thereto.—Jones v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 168 Mich. 1.

¶ 481. A train is within yard limits at a station within a rule of the company regulating the manner in which trains must pass into stations though there is no post on the line in question defining the limits, where there is such a post on the company's parallel line and the train is within it.—Fernette v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 175 Mich. 653.

¶ 482. A train is at a station within a rule of a railway company relating to the manner in which certain trains must pass into all stations and to the possibility of striking trains within the station switches though such train is not within the switches where it is in the immediate vicinity of side tracks which the rule requires must be approached cautiously and it stands within yard limits, since the word station as used covers so much of the track as is commonly used by trains which are compelled to stop at the station by adverse signals.—Fernette v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 175 Mich. 653.

¶ 483. A point designated by a railway company on its time card as a station is a station within a rule of the company relating to the manner in which certain trains must pass into and through all stations, where a telegraph operator is maintained there, books are kept in which certain trains must register and the company issues running orders to such point.—Fernette v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 175 Mich. 653.

¶ 484. A train dispatcher is not chargeable with notice that the trainmen will disregard the well-understood rules of the railroad, and in giving his orders he is not guilty of negligence in relying upon their observance.—Veit v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 150 Mich. 358.

¶ 485. In an action for personal injuries by a brakeman against a railroad company, a waiver of an express rule agreed to by the employees can be established only by showing the custom of coupling cars followed by employees to have been so universal and notorious that the company is presumed to know it.—Nichols v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 125 Mich. 394.

¶ 486. Rules and regulations of a board of public works of a city as to the manner in which contractors shall dig and protect trenches in the public streets are for the protection of the public and not for the employees of a contractor who may be injured by the latter's failure to observe such regulations.—Baucino v. Fitzpatrick, 186 Mich. 1.

¶ 487. Where a rule or notice is habitually violated by employees, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the master, or is not enforced, then the rule or notice may be treated as abrogated.—Johnson v. Burke, 167 Mich. 349.

Care and diligence required of master, see ante § 33.

Duty to furnish safe tools, appliances and places, see ante § 46.

Assumption of risks from reliance on promise to repair, see post § 56h.

Evidence as to inspection and repair, see post §§ 64d, 65f.

Instructions as to test and inspections, see post § 71c.

¶ 488. It is not necessary, in order to recover for injuries resulting from defective machinery, that the master had actual knowledge of such defects, but it is enough to show such facts and circumstances to exist that, if he had exercised reasonable care and diligence, he would have ascertained its true condition by examination and inspection.—Johnson v. Spear, 76 Mich. 139; Johnson v. Spear, 82 Mich. 453.

¶ 489. The owner of a coal-dock who contracts for unloading coal during the season of navigation at a specified price per ton, his engineer and foreman supervising the work and renewing necessary hoisting chains, and to furnish the contractor a stationary engine upon the dock, and the appliances therewith, including the chain attached to the buckets in which the coal is hoisted from the vessels to the dock (under which ascending buckets the contractor's employees are obliged to work during the early part of such unloading), which contract is silent as to repairs, is charged with the duty of examining and inspecting such engine and appliances, and is liable for any injury resulting to said employees by reason of the weak and worn condition of said chain, if he knows, or could know by such inspection, of its insufficiency.—Johnson v. Spear, 76 Mich. 139; Johnson v. Spear, 82 Mich. 453.

¶ 490. The statutory requirement that every railroad shall impartially and diligently receive and forward the cars of other roads does not apply to cars unfit for passage, but means that no needless delays or hindrances shall be interposed, and that all precautions against the use of improper cars shall be adopted with reference to reasonable dispatch.—Smith v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 46 Mich. 258.

¶ 491. The duty resting upon the master to provide a reasonably safe place for the employee to perform his services is a continuing duty, to the extent that it requires the master to provide reasonably for the inspection, and, if need be, for the repair, of premises or appliances.—Balhoff v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 106 Mich. 606; Anderson v. Michigan Cent. R. Co, 107 Mich. 591.

¶ 492. The duty of diligence in maintaining machinery in a reasonably safe condition necessarily involves the duty of the master to take such reasonable measures to inform himself from time to time of its condition as common prudence dictates.—McDonald v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 108 Mich. 7.

¶ 493. A master is bound to inspect appliances from time to time and to use ordinary care and skill to discover and repair defects in them.—Wachsmuth v. Shaw Electric Crane Co., 118 Mich. 275.

¶ 494. The master need not inspect an appliance to prevent injury from falling weights, when he has placed a guard efficient for that purpose had the injured servant not tampered with it.—Schwandt v. William Wright Co., 126 Mich. 609.

¶ 495. Plaintiff's intestate, an engineer duly licensed, was employed by defendant, and during such employment assisted in the installation of a boiler in defendant's hotel, and made an inspection of such boiler; later he assisted the public inspector in several inspections. Three years later plaintiff's intestate was killed by the bursting of the mud pipe elbow attached to the boiler, and his administratrix brings this suit to recover for the negligent causing of his death. It appears that the explosion was caused either by an original defect in said elbow or by corrosion, either of which would have been disclosed by proper inspection. Held, that as defendant had no notice of any incompetence in deceased rendering further inspection necessary, plaintiff cannot recover.—Vincent v. Clements, 150 Mich. 406.

¶ 496. An elevator is a dangerous instrument, and the employer owes a duty to exercise a care in keeping it in repair and safe condition commensurate with the gravity of accidents which a reasonably prudent man would anticipate under the circumstances.—Wilson v. Escanaba Woodenware Co., 152 Mich. 540.

¶ 497. Where in the process of quarrying rock, it is customary to examine the face of the quarry after each blast, and the master can find and remove loose rock by the exercise of reasonable care and examination, it is its duty to do so.—Druck v. Antrim Lime Co., 167 Mich. 154.

¶ 498. It is the defendant employer's duty not only to provide in the first place a safe apparatus for starting and stopping a milling machine, but he must continue to keep the same in repair.—Deary v. Hecla Co., 161 Mich. 677.

¶ 499. The negligence of an employee in failing to give warning of some act about to be done by him, which may be dangerous to a fellow-servant, is not within the rule requiring inspection on the part of the employer.—Mesich v. Tamarack Min. Co., 184 Mich. 363.

¶ 500. A railway company whose track is broken without any fault of its own is under no obligation to its employees to repair it within any specified time, if it duly warns them so that they shall not be injured in consequence thereof.—Henry v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 49 Mich. 495.

§ 53a. ——Delegation of duty.

Delegation of duty to furnish safe tools, appliances and places, see ante § 47.
Delegation of duty to warn and instruct, see post § 54a.
Vice principals and representatives of master as fellow-servants, see post § 55f.
Burden of showing negligence of master, see post § 62a.

¶ 501. The duty which the master owes to his servants to provide a reasonably safe place in which to work, and machinery in a reasonably safe condition, is not discharged for all time by providing machinery or premises safe in the first instance, nor can it be discharged by providing for an inspection by a fellow-servant.—McDonald v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 108 Mich. 7.

¶ 502. The duty of inspecting machinery for the purpose of determining its safety is imposed by law upon the employer, and no delegation of that duty will lessen his responsibility. On the other hand the duty of inspection for the purpose of keeping the machinery in good working order is a duty which may be delegated, and the employer thereby absolved of responsibility.—Clark v. Goldie, 146 Mich. 303.

¶ 503. The existence of the distinction of the duty of the master to inspect machinery for the purpose of determining its safety, a duty which he cannot delegate, and the duty of inspection for the purpose of keeping the machinery in good working order, a duty which may be delegated, is important, and to refuse to recognize it would be to assert that the class of employees to whom is entrusted the duty of keeping the machinery in good working order are vice principals, while in fact they are fellow-servants.—Clark v. Goldie, 146 Mich. 303.

¶ 504. A mill owner, who selects one of his employees and imposes upon him the duty of seeing that all the machinery and structure with which the work is done are kept in repair, assumes responsibility for the negligence of the employee so selected in performing the duty.—Van Dusen v. Letellier, 78 Mich. 492.

¶ 505. The master of a servant employed in a lumber mill and injured as the result of the giving way of a dock, owing to the breaking of a post by reason of a latent defect, cannot, if he has neglected the duty of personal inspection of the premises, escape liability by having delegated the duty to another.—Van Dusen v. Letellier, 78 Mich. 492.

¶ 506. An employer owes to his employees the duty to furnish a safe place to work; such duty is a continuing one to be reasonably performed by inspection and repair, and cannot be delegated for performance so as to relieve the employer from responsibility. —Gillespie v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 150 Mich. 308.

¶ 507. The duty to furnish a reasonably safe boiler, and have all necessary inspections made, is a primary duty of the employer, which cannot ordinarily be delegated so as to escape liability.—Vincent v. Clements, 150 Mich. 406.

¶ 508. Muckers working at the bottom of a mine ascended with the bucket at noontime, and after letting go of the bucket the hoisting cable broke and the bucket fell, injuring plaintiff. The weight of the bucket and men was much less than the safe working strain of the cable, which after the accident appeared to be badly frayed and in a weakened condition. Held, it was not only the duty of the defendant to furnish a safe cable but to inspect it, and the fact that inspection was left to miners was evidence of negligence.—Maki v. Mohawk Min. Co., 176 Mich. 497.

§ 53b. ——Simple tools and appliances.

¶ 509. Since an inspection of a "snap hammer" used in riveting would not have shown any defect therein, a machinist injured by a sliver flying from the hammer could not recover for such injury as the duty of the inspection does not extend to small and common tools in everyday use, of the fitness for use of which the employee may reasonably be supposed to be a better judge than the master.—Wachsmuth v. Shaw Elec. Crane Co., 118 Mich. 275.

¶ 510. Where a hammer, owned by a fellow-servant, had been purchased from a reputable dealer, the master owed other servants no duty to inspect it.—Dompier v. Lewis, 131 Mich. 144.

¶ 511. A pick is a tool of such common use as to impose upon the master no duty of inspection.—Toth v. Osceola Min. Co., 180 Mich. 274.

D. WARNINGS AND INSTRUCTIONS.

§ 54. In general; duty to warn or instruct.

Care and diligence required of master, see ante § 33.

Contributory negligence in disregarding warnings and instructions, see post § 59 l.

Burden of showing negligence of master, see post § 62a.

Evidence as to warnings and instructions, see post §§ 64f, 65i.

Jury questions as to warnings and instructions, see post § 67 l.

Instructions as to warnings and instructions, see post § 71d.

¶ 512. The absolute and nondelegable duty to warn an employee of dangers arises as an incident of the employer's duty to furnish and maintain a reasonably safe place for the employee to perform his work.—Kangas v. Cleveland Cliffs Iron Co., 188 Mich. 255.

¶ 513. A master is not required to anticipate every possible accident and give warning or instructions accordingly and may leave an employee to learn the hazards of the business from his associates and experience, where the hazards are not extraordinary.—Nowakowski v. Detroit Stove Works, 130 Mich. 308.

¶ 514. An employer is not required to either give instructions in regard to the work or inquire into the experience of a person he sets at work of a nonhazardous nature not requiring any particular skill.—Jackson v. Schillinger Bros. Co., 182 Mich. 504, 7 N. C. C. A. 576.

¶ 515. An obligation rests upon an employer to acquaint an employee with the dangers which can be ascertained by a knowledge of scientific principles, and to which he would be, in his ignorance, otherwise subjected.—Adams v. Grand Rapids Refrigerator Co., 160 Mich. 590.

¶ 516. Unless the master warns, instructs and informs the servant as to all the dangers incident to the work which are not discoverable from ordinary observation by an inexperienced person who would have no reason to anticipate danger, the master is liable where injury follows because of the servant's lack of knowledge, and because he was unwarned and uninformed.—Lobenstein v. Whitehead & Kales Iron Works, 179 Mich. 279.

¶ 517. Where extraordinary risks or latent dangers, of which the workmen, either from ignorance or inexperience, lack knowledge, attend the employment, the employer should caution such workmen accordingly.—Smith v. Peninsular Car Works, 60 Mich. 501.

¶ 518. A railroad company is guilty of negligence in sending a switchman into a lumber yard without warning him of dangers arising from a pile of lumber known to be too near the track.—Bradburn v. Wabash R. Co., 134 Mich. 575.

¶ 519. The general superintendent and manager of a railway construction company was negligent in placing loaded cars on a spur track that had recently been shortened, and in failing to give notice of that fact to those in charge of the train on which plaintiff was riding, where in consequence a servant of such company riding the cars was injured in a collision of the train with the loaded cars.—Milbourne v. Arnold Elec. Power Station Co., 140 Mich. 316.

¶ 520. Where a plaintiff is injured by a dangerous machine which he was expected to make use of in his work, he may recover if there was a failure on the part of the defendant, his employer, to properly instruct him.—Marklewitz v. Olds Motor Works, 152 Mich. 113.

¶ 521. Where the deceased left his usual duties, took a scow and went out into a stream for the purpose of repairing a dam in process of construction, recovery for his death by drowning is not defeated by the fact that he was instructed to load the scow but not to leave the shore, where the superintendent stood near by on the dam and gave the deceased no warning of hidden dangers.—Snow v. Escanaba Power Co., 162 Mich. 579.

¶ 522. A mining corporation is liable for the death of a miner killed by falling rock in the course of his employment as a "hitch cutter," preparing footings for stull timbers, where it put him at work in an excavation wherein the work had been carried forward so there was room for two or three sets of such supports as they are commonly placed, without informing him of the fact, which it well knew, but of which he was ignorant, that the walls of the excavation had been left unsupported since the preceding day, and that the character of the walls was such that those left for that length of time without support might break suddenly and fall, though apparently solid.—Andrews v. Tamarack Min. Co., 114 Mich. 375.

¶ 523. Where a quarry laborer is required to be in the vicinity of his place of employment during his noon hour, and in eating his dinner on the highway at a place of his own selection, is injured by stone from a blast, his master has a duty to give reasonable and timely warning of blasts.—Moronen v. McDonnell, 177 Mich. 691.

¶ 524. If persons engaged in dangerous occupations are not informed by their employers of the accompanying dangers, and if, remaining in ignorance of such danger, they suffer in consequence, their employers will be chargeable for the injuries sustained.—Mather v. Rillston, 156 U. S. 391, 39 L. ed. 464, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 464.

§ 54a. Delegation of duty.

Of duty to furnish safe tools, appliances and places, see ante § 47.
Of duty to inspect and repair, see ante § 53a.

¶ 525. The action of a foreman in directing a cleansing poison to be put in a water cooler used by employees without accompanying the direction with instructions to adopt precautionary measures to prevent injury, was within the foreman's powers, and the employer was liable to an employee who was poisoned by drinking the contents.—Geller v. Briscoe Mfg. Co., 136 Mich. 330.

¶ 526. A mill company was bound by the instructions given to its employees by its foreman, as to the dangers of their employment, in an action for personal injuries, where such instruction as it was defendant's duty to give had been intrusted to such foreman.—McDonald v. Champion Iron & Steel Co., 140 Mich. 401.

¶ 527. In an action for personal injuries where the plaintiff was injured through his ignorance of the use of the tool which he was using, the failure of his overseer and foreman to properly instruct him in the proper use of the tool was not the negligence of a fellow-servant which would bar recovery.—Brockmiller v. Industrial Works, 148 Mich. 642.

¶ 528. Where the owner of a drug store delegates to a person the duty of instructing an employee how to fill the soda fountain tank, such person's negligence in carrying out these instructions is the negligence of the owner.—McDonnell v. Central Drug Co., 170 Mich. 291.

¶ 529. Where miners are accustomed to work in pairs in timbering drifts so that they may be safely used as passageways the duty to warn as to risks is a delegable duty, and is fully performed when the master selects a suitable and competent fellow-workman and makes it his duty to give warning.—Aho v. Cleveland Cliffs Iron Co., 188 Mich. 218.

§ 54b. Master's knowledge or notice of danger.

Notice or knowledge of incompetency of employee, see post § 55c.

Rule that notice of danger to agent is notice to principal, see Agency, II, E.

¶ 530. Until a master knows or appreciates or in the exercise of ordinary care should know or appreciate a danger to his employee, there is no obligation upon him to warn the employee of such danger.—Stone v. Bennett, 194 Mich. 441.

¶ 531. Where a miner was injured by the explosion of an unexploded charge left by members of the preceding shift it was held that the master was not bound as a matter of law to discover and notify plaintiff of the existence of the unexploded charge.—Conradsen v. Osceola Consolidated Mining Co., 180 Mich. 155.

¶ 532. The knowledge of an assistant foreman in a foundry, that a hoist fell, is not imputed to the owner so as to charge him with the duty to warn the employees of the danger therefrom.—Bauer v. American Car & Foundry Co., 132 Mich. 537.

¶ 533. In an action for personal injuries sustained by a woodsman as the result of a tree falling upon him, which was felled by a member of another gang working near him, held that the plaintiff's employer who was within a few feet of him at the time of the accident was not guilty of negligence in failing to warn the plaintiff of danger, the defendant, as soon as he appreciated the danger, having jumped aside himself and shouted a warning to the plaintiff.—Stone v. Bennett, 194 Mich. 441.

¶ 534. In an action by a car repairer against his employer to recover damages for injuries sustained in the course of his employment by a broken drawbar carrying iron not discovered by the employer's car inspectors and reported by them for repair falling upon him when he went under the car to repair another defect reported by the inspectors, held that plaintiff could only recover for some neglect of duty which the employer or its servants owed to plaintiff, and the failure of the inspectors to discover the broken drawbar carrying iron was a failure of duty owed to the employer and not to plaintiff.—Sims v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. Ry. Co., 196 Mich. 114.

Assumption of known or obvious risks, see post § 56b.

Contributory negligence in failing to avoid known or obvious dangers, see post § 59e.

¶ 535. It seems that a master need not expressly notify his servant of a risk where the nature of the business and of the risk is such that the only effective notice he can have is from his own general experience and the visible presence of that from which the danger is to be apprehended.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Smithson, 45 Mich. 212.

¶ 536. A master is not bound to inform an employee of dangers that are open to ordinary observation.—Findlay v. Russel Wheel & Foundry Co., 108 Mich. 286.

¶ 537. A master is not required to give warning of danger apparent and readily comprehended to a servant of ordinary intelligence and years of discretion.—Livingstone v. Saginaw Plate Glass Co., 146 Mich. 236.

¶ 538. There is no duty to warn the servant of a known danger or of one so obvious that the servant in view of his years and experience ought to perceive it.—Swick v. Aetna Portland Cement Co., 147 Mich. 454, per Hooker and Carpenter, JJ., others concurring in the result.

¶ 539. Where an employee whose duty it is to remove hides from vats in a tannery, and to put them in wash-wheels, knows the time when the wheels are to be started, it is not negligence to start, without notice to him, a wheel in a vat in which he is not working.—Balle v. Detroit Leather Co., 73 Mich. 158.

¶ 540. Warning or instructions are not necessary to a mature man familiar with a mill and its machinery, though he is called from his usual work to assist in starting the mill in which he is employed, and is injured while oiling a shaft, by getting his arm between some cog wheels, where the room was properly lighted and the danger was visible and the work he was doing was neither dangerous nor difficult and there was no defect in the machinery.—Hathaway v. Washington Milling Co., 139 Mich. 708.

¶ 541. It is not a master's duty to inform a laborer of the particular ingredients used in the manufacture of Paris green, if such laborer is notified of their poisonous character, and of the precautions necessary.—Fox v. Peninsular White Lead & Color Works, 84 Mich. 676.

¶ 542. The duty to provide a safe place to work does not cover the case of a safe place made unsafe by the temporary removal of a guard over a belt and the failure to warn the servant of such removal at the time of sending him there to work, where the absence of the guard was as obvious to the servant as to the master.—Swick v. Aetna Portland Cement Co., 147 Mich. 454, per Hooker and Carpenter, JJ., others concurring in the result.

¶ 543. It is implied in the contract of hiring of a person as a telephone lineman that he knows those things with reference to the creating of groundings and circuits which a telephone lineman must necessarily know in order to conduct his business with any degree of safety to himself, his employer, or his coemployees.—De Kallands v. Washtenaw Home Tel. Co., 153 Mich. 25.

¶ 544. Plaintiff upon being employed by defendant company did not know how to handle live electric wires, and so informed defendant. He climbed a pole to solder a dead wire and while attempting to straddle it, rose up too high, came in contact with a high voltage wire, and was injured. He knew that live wires were strung on the poles and that there was danger. Held, he could not predicate negligence against defendant upon its failure to instruct him how to handle live wires.—Argersinger v. Commonwealth Power Co., 164 Mich. 282.

¶ 545. Among the several gangs of laborers employed in excavating a ship canal was the pipe gang, whose duty it was to extend the air and water pipes used for the air drills and shovels. Plaintiff was a member of this gang. Two parallel lines of track were laid for the cars used to carry off the rock. Plaintiff was ordered by the foreman of his gang to adjust a valve on a pipe lying between the two lines of track, upon which cars were standing ready to be filled. While he was so engaged, the shovel gang caused a shovelful of rock to be lifted into one of the cars, and a rock fell off and injured plaintiff. Plaintiff knew that rocks often fell off the shovel and knew as soon as his foreman, standing some six feet away, that the shovel was at that moment being operated. Held, plaintiff's foreman owed him no duty to warn him of the danger.—Dunn v. Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co., 161 Mich. 551.

¶ 546. An employer is under no duty to warn a man who has had extensive experience in the use of machinery, and is of mature years, of the danger in attempting to put a belt upon a moving pulley by hand.—Neifert v. Metler, 165 Mich. 354.

¶ 547. The operator of a power driven wringer, who knows that if he permits his hand to go between the rollers of the machine he will be hurt, and who had been cutting burlap and wrapping it about the rollers for four months, need not be informed of the consequences if his hand be attached so tightly to the burlap that he cannot withdraw it.—Fryezynski v. W. W. Rice Leather Co., 171 Mich. 113.

¶ 548. Plaintiff, whose hand was injured while he was operating a sausage grinder, when it was drawn into the hopper, cannot recover for alleged negligence of defendant in failing to properly instruct him how to operate the machine where it appears that he was 25 years of age and was possessed of more than average intelligence, that he was familiar with machinery and with the grinder in question since he had often taken it apart and cleaned it, that he knew of the danger of putting his hands into the hopper to crowd the meat down and was instructed concerning a safe way which he did not follow.—Oest v. Hendershot, 175 Mich. 140.

¶ 549. A miner, one of a shift engaged in drilling and blasting rock which followed another shift engaged in the same work who had left an unexploded charge in one of the holes, which was discharged by the drilling, cannot hold the master guilty of negligence in failing to notify him of the existence of the unexploded charge where the evidence showed that he was in a position to have all the knowledge of the conditions that anyone could have.—Conradsen v. Osceola Consolidated Mining Co., 180 Mich. 155.

¶ 550. Where an employee was injured while breaking rock with a dull pick by being struck in the eye by a splinter of rock, it was held that negligence could not be predicated upon the master's failure to warn him of the danger of flying splinters as the result of using a dull pick.—Toth v. Osceola Min. Co., 180 Mich. 274.

¶ 551. In an action for injuries claimed to have been caused by coming in contact with a circular saw upon the jumping of a board being sawed, plaintiff testified that he had used the saw for seven months, knew how to operate it and the danger in connection therewith; that the saw had always worked well while he operated it and had never given any trouble, and that he knew of no reason why it did not work well when he was injured, it was held that defendant was not liable.—Dombrowski v. Roe-Stephens Mfg. Co., 180 Mich. 202.

¶ 552. The danger of riding on the side of the tender of a locomotive when passing through roundhouse doors, with a clearance of from eleven to sixteen inches, is so obvious that the failure of an employer to warn a servant of the danger is not negligence.—Hollingshead v. Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 181 Mich. 547.

¶ 553. Where a night switchman had been in the employ of a railroad company for 24 days, and one of his nightly duties as a member of the night crew was to bring from the building of one company a soda ash car and spot it in the building of another company, and only the single unloaded car had been handled previous to the day he was injured, but on the day of his injury a coal car was found on the way to the latter building and placed between the engine and the ash car, and, after the ash car passed through the door, near the jamb of which and on the outside of the building the plaintiff was standing to report signals to the engineer which were given by a switchman inside the building, he was hit by the coal car, which used three inches more of the clearance space than the other car, and was squeezed between it and the jamb of the door, held that the defendant was not guilty of negligence in failing to notify the plaintiff that the coal car was of a different dimension than the other car or in failing to provide a reasonably safe place to work.—Sage v. Wyandotte Terminal R. Co., 193 Mich. 194.

§ 54d. Immature and inexperienced employees.

Statutory provisions as to employment of children, see ante § 35.

Age or experience of employee as bearing on assumption of risk, see post § 56d.

Jury questions as to violation of Child Labor Law, see post § 67e.

¶ 554. In determining what notice the master should see that a young servant has of the dangerous character of machinery, youth and inexperience must be considered, also the nature of the service and the degree to which his attention while at work would need to be devoted to its performance.—King v. Ford River Lumber Co., 93 Mich. 172.

¶ 555. The proprietor of a lime-kiln was in the habit of having the stone removed from the base of the kiln, as it was burned, and of pushing the mass, wedged into the crater above, down into the emptied space. When the mass gave way those who were upon it and crowding it down would step back to the margin of the crater to escape going down with it. The proprietor had an inexperienced laborer helping him at his work when an unusually large quantity of burned stone had been removed, and he did not warn him of the danger. When the mass dropped the workman fell with it and was burned to death. Held, that his employer was liable for causing his death by negligence.—Parkhurst v. Johnson, 50 Mich. 70.

¶ 556. An employer or foreman, when setting an unlearned servant to work carrying molten iron over an icy footway, has a duty to the servant that is not satisfied by merely telling him not to go too fast.—Smith v. Peninsular Car Works, 60 Mich. 501.

¶ 557. An employer's failure to instruct a boy eighteen years old that he must keep his hands away from knives which formed part of the machine at which he is working or he will be injured, is not negligence where the working of the machine is apparent at a glance, and where it appears that the boy has been apprenticed to a plumber and has worked in a pulp mill, so that he has some knowledge of mechanics if not of machinery.—Mackin v. Alaska Refrigerator Co., 100 Mich. 276.

¶ 558. No recovery can be had in favor of an infant 15 years of age injured by a feed cutter which he was operating, based on the failure of the master to warn him of the danger, where it appears affirmatively that he knew of the danger and appreciated it.—Ertz v. Pierson, 130 Mich. 160.

¶ 559. Plaintiff, less than 18 years old, had been employed for more than a month in a foundry filling molds. When returning from the cupola he met a fellow-employee carrying a ladle of molten iron, a teaspoonful of which was spilled and upon striking the wet floor exploded and a portion struck plaintiff putting out his eye. Action was brought alleging failure to provide a safe place to work and failure to warn of the danger. The evidence showed that the general condition of the floor was safe, and that the spilling of molten iron was a common occurrence, and plaintiff had seen it spilled and had spilled it himself. Held that the employer was not liable.—Nowakowski v. Detroit Stove Works, 130 Mich. 308.

¶ 560. It was the duty of a mill company employing boys to work behind shears in a long and narrow passage gathering scraps of iron from such shears and binding them into bundles, where the gears and other machinery were so exposed that if the scraps accumulated on the floor, one passing through the passage would be in danger of coming in contact with the cogwheels of such machinery, to take reasonable precautions to keep the passageway clear, and to that end to give instructions to such employees before setting them to work at these shears; where it appeared that the infant killed had come in contact with such cogwheels while attempting to pass over such obstructions in the passage.—McDonald v. Champion Iron & Steel Co., 140 Mich. 401.

¶ 561. A boy of 17 working on a resawing machine and having some experience with machines, including a swing saw, assumes the risk of reaching under the revolving saw to clean out the sawdust from a trough beneath, where the space between the teeth of the saw and the trough was six or seven inches and he took a short stick in his hand to clear the trough so that it was necessary to reach under the saw; and it is not necessary that he should have been warned of the danger. (Decided on authority of Kean v. Detroit Copper & Brass Rolling Mills, 66 Mich. 277; Hathaway v. Washington Milling Co., 139 Mich. 708.)—Martin v. Detroit Lumber Co., 141 Mich. 363.

¶ 562. It is the master's duty to warn the servant of latent dangers, which he (the servant) through ignorance or inexperience is not capable of understanding or appreciating, or which he would not be likely to know; and the liability of an explosion following the mixing of molten metal and water is such a latent danger.—Borkowski v. American Radiator Co., 165 Mich. 266.

¶ 563. Where an applicant for employment as a brakeman on a regular freight train, in order to obtain the position, falsely states to the agent of the railroad company to whom the application is made, and to the conductor to whose train he is assigned under such employment, that he has had experience in the line of work mentioned, the company has a right to believe that he is familiar with the work, and to govern itself, as to instructions regarding the manner of its performance, accordingly.—Stanley v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 101 Mich. 202.

¶ 564. Plaintiff having represented, at the time of seeking employment as a brakeman from defendant, that he had had twenty-seven days' experience, there was no negligence in failing to warn him of the danger in coupling cars supplied with double deadwoods.—Fenlon v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co., 108 Mich. 284.

¶ 565. In a suit for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff while temporarily operating a molding machine in defendant's mill, the evidence was that plaintiff for a period of nine years had been employed as a common laborer to shovel coal and handle lumber about the mill; that occasionally and for brief periods of time, upon a shortage of hands, he operated some of the machines located in defendant's old building; that the molding machine in question located in defendant's new building differed in construction from those located in the old building; that plaintiff was called from his usual work as a common laborer to operate said machine on the occasion in question; that he informed defendant's foreman he did not know how to run said machine; that he was given no instructions or warnings; and that he was injured by invisible revolving knives while placing his hand upon the bed plate of said machine in an attempt to discover, while standing at the rear of the same, the reason for its failure to work properly. Held, the defendant was guilty of negligence for failure to warn and instruct the plaintiff.—Molyneaux v. Bradley, Miller & Co., 167 Mich. 278. (Ostrander, C. J., dissenting.)

¶ 566. Where a man only twenty-four years old, not a miner by profession, was employed in handling dynamite and fulminating caps kept in an engine-house where they were continually in danger, both from the heat and from constant jarring, as well as from their confused and disorderly position, and where his employers made no effort to lessen the heat and the jarring, and did not inform him of the danger although he was ignorant thereof, held, that the employers were negligent, and that they were liable for injuries to him from an explosion.—Mather v. Rillston, 156 U. S. 391, 39 L. ed. 464, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 464.

§ 54e. Work outside scope of employment.

Liability for injuries sustained while acting beyond scope of employment, see also ante § 34.

Assumption of risks outside scope of employment, see post § 56e.

¶ 567. The rule that the law does not impose upon the master the duty to warn or instruct his servant in regard to work he is neither employed nor required to do, applied where a driller in a stone quarry, at the request of a fellow-servant who had no right to direct him, forced a stick of dynamite into too small a hole, thereby causing an explosion resulting in the injury in question.—Kopf v. Monroe Stone Co., 133 Mich. 286.

¶ 568. Where a servant is put to dangerous work, or is sent into a dangerous place to work, outside of the scope of his employment, it is the master's duty to know, not to infer, that the servant had knowledge of the danger.—Lobenstein v. Whitehead & Kales Iron Works, 179 Mich. 279.

§ 54f. Sufficiency and construction of warnings and instructions.

Evidence as to warnings and instructions, see post §§ 64f, 65i.

¶ 569. In order to relieve a railroad company from liability for an injury which occurred through the failure of the brakeman or conductor of a passenger train equipped with air brakes to pull the automatic cord by which such brakes are operated, it is not necessary that the instructions as to the use of the cord should have been embodied in the company's printed rules; it is enough that the employees were orally instructed as to their duties.—Whalen v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 114 Mich. 512.

¶ 570. Where a servant was warned generally concerning the operation of a polishing machine in a tannery, no further instructions were necessary unless there was something peculiar to the particular machine upon which he was set to work which necessitated other instruction.—Sabin v. Northwestern Leather Co., 157 Mich. 579.

¶ 571. Plaintiff, a man 25 years of age and possessed of more than average intelligence, is sufficiently instructed as to the dangers of operating a sausage grinder with which he is familiar when he is told to crowd the meat into the hopper with his hands and is shown a safe way to do it.—Oest v. Hendershot, 175 Mich. 140.

¶ 572. Where a quarry company gives warning of a blast to an employee, who is eating his dinner during his noon hour at a place, on the highway, of his own selection, it is not negligent in not giving distinct warning of a subsequent blast.—Moronen v. McDonnell, 177 Mich. 691.

¶ 573. Where instructions are given by one servant to another in the presence of the master, it may be inferred that the instructions are approved by the master.—Sipes v. Michigan Starch Co., 137 Mich. 258.

¶ 574. A printed notice to switchmen setting out non-clearing points on the tracks and naming among others, The American Car Company, Forge Department, and immediately underneath, in the same type, "material piled along side of tracks," is held to refer to material at the particular point, so as not to constitute notice of material that might be piled at any place along the track.—Bradburn v. Wabash R. Co., 134 Mich. 575.

¶ 575. Where a plaintiff is found by the jury to be unlikely to appreciate the danger of following instructions given to him as to the operation of the machine, then, regardless of the condition of the machine, the giving of instructions by the person charged with the duty of giving them, under which the employee was made to do the work in a dangerous way when there was a safe way, is actionable negligence.—Clemens v. Gem Fibre Package Co., 153 Mich. 495.

E. ACTS AND OMISSIONS OF FELLOW-SERVANTS.

Who deemed fellow-servants, see post § 55d.
Railroad employees as fellow-servants, see post § 55j.
Mine employees as fellow-servants, see post § 55p.
Assumption of risks of fellow-servants' acts or negligence, see post § 56 l.
Evidence as to competency or negligence of fellow-servants, see post §§ 64g, 65j.
Jury questions as to care or negligence of fellow-servants, see post § 67a.
Directing verdict on ground of fellow-servant's negligence, see post § 70c.
Instructions as to acts of fellow-servant, see post § 71e.

¶ 576. An employer is not liable to an employee for injuries resulting from negligence, misconduct or unskilfulness of fellow-servants engaged in the same general employment, where the employer himself is not in fault.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Leahey, 10 Mich. 193; Davis v. Detroit & M. R. Co., 20 Mich. 105; Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Dolan, 32 Mich. 510; Henry v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 49 Mich. 495; Hewitt v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 67 Mich. 61.

¶ 577. A master is liable for injuries to servants that spring from such negligent acts of fellow-servants as are due to their incompetency if the master himself has been negligent in selecting competent servants, or has kept incompetent ones after hearing of their unfitness, or when he might have heard of it by using ordinary care in making inquiry.—Hilts v. Chicago & G. T. Ry., 55 Mich. 437.

¶ 578. A master is not liable for injuries personally suffered by his servant through a fellow-servant's negligence.—Harrison v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 79 Mich. 409.

¶ 579. If a porter in a store was working in the cellar, near an elevator, when a plank, used in removing heavy boxes from the elevator to trucks in the alley back of the store, slid down the shaft and struck and injured him, he cannot recover for the injury, since the use of the plank in removing boxes was not in itself negligence and if the accident happened through the fault of others, who like him were engaged in removing the goods, it was the negligence of fellow-employees, and he could not recover therefor.—Alford v. Metcalf Brothers & Co., 74 Mich. 369.

¶ 580. Where the engineer of defendant's sawmill, by whose action in starting the engine of the mill plaintiff's decedent was killed, was decedent's fellow-servant, his negligence could not be imputed to defendants.—Bergstrom v. Staples, 82 Mich. 654.

¶ 581. Actionable negligence of an employer was not shown where an employee, an experienced carpenter, was injured by the breaking of a scaffold on which he and another carpenter, whom he called to his assistance, were working; where it appeared that defendant's foreman had directed such employee to use at least two planks for the platform of such scaffold, but at the time of the accident, the scaffold had but one plank for a platform.—Dewey v. Parke, 76 Mich. 631.

¶ 582. A blacksmith is not liable as being negligent in allowing a defective sledge-hammer, awaiting repairs, to remain in the shop open to view, in case an employee picks up this hammer without instructions to do so and without necessity, and in course of the use of it on work in the shop a fragment flies off and injures the eye of another employee.—Rawley v. Colliau, 90 Mich. 31.

¶ 583. A ship carpenter cannot recover for injuries received, while working on a vessel, by falling down a hatchway known to him and left uncovered by his fellow-servants, the place to work being safe but for that.—Baron v. Detroit & C. Steam Nav. Co., 91 Mich. 585.

¶ 584. Plaintiff's employer had contracted to fill defendant's ice-house, and to that end to use a hoisting apparatus furnished by defendant. Plaintiff was injured by an ice bucket falling upon him by reason of the breaking of a wire cable attached to the buckets. Held, that defendant's duty was discharged when it furnished the hoisting apparatus in a reasonably safe condition, and that it cannot be held responsible for injuries to plaintiff resulting from the improper management of the apparatus by plaintiff's fellow-servants.—Piette v. Bavarian Brewing Co., 91 Mich. 605.

¶ 585. If, owing to the use of a defective flask in making a mold, the heated metal escapes from the mold and injures a molder, the fault, if any, must be regarded as that of a fellow-servant, where the molds are made by the employees, to whom numerous flasks have been supplied without requirement to use the defective one.—Kehoe v. Allen, 92 Mich. 464.

¶ 586. If a cable was reasonably safe for the purpose for which it was intended, and the accident was due to the negligence of an engineer in sending the car down the incline with the cable slack, defendant master was not liable.—Hennig v. Globe Foundry Co., 112 Mich. 616.

¶ 587. Negligence, if any, in failing to curb a sewer trench, was the negligence of a fellow-servant of a digger who sustained injury by the caving in of the ground, where the contractor had furnished plenty of sound material, and a competent man to do the curbing.—Lenderink v. Village of Rockford, 135 Mich. 531.

¶ 588. An employer, who has furnished good material for the building of scaffolds and has employed an experienced scaffold builder, is not liable for injury to a bricklayer caused by the breaking of a plank in a scaffold at a point weakened by a knot, for if negligence existed it was that of a fellow-servant.—Landowski v. Chapoton, 137 Mich. 429.

¶ 589. In an action by a servant for injuries sustained by the operation of a dredge, where from the evidence it appeared that three concurrent acts made the injury possible, the slipping of the plaintiff on the deck, the clutching of a steam-operated clamp, and the turning of steam into the cylinder, and the competency or incompetency of the fireman had nothing to do with it, if he was competent to perform his duty and his act was in any respect negligent, it was the negligence of a fellow-servant.—Hartnett v. Owosso Sugar Co., 147 Mich. 650.

¶ 590. The use by a fellow-servant of ice tongs, which are patently insufficient to secure a sufficient hold upon a cake of ice to support its weight, is negligence for which the master is not liable.—Wheaton v. Wagner Lake Ice & Coal Co., 151 Mich. 100.

¶ 591. Plaintiff, a mason's tender, was employed by defendant railway in the construction of an addition to defendant's roundhouse used for the storage of engines. He was hurt while carrying a window cap to be placed over a window in the oilroom, which was used for storing the oil used in the engines housed in the roundhouse while being prepared to be used in drawing trains. The accident resulted from the faulty construction of a scaffold by a fellow-servant of plaintiff. Held, plaintiff came within the provisions of section 1, Act No. 104, Pub. Acts of 1909, abolishing the fellow-servant rule, and was entitled to recover, and did not come within the provision of section 7 of said Act, to the effect that said act should not apply to employees working in shops or offices.—Furguson v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 169 Mich. 260.

¶ 592. A car repairer employed in a car shop held a shop hand, and within the exception of § 7 of Act No. 104, Pub. Acts 1909, § 4116, How. St., 2nd Ed., although at the time of his injury he was on his way from the shop to make repairs on a locomotive in the immediate vicinity.—Revolinski v. Manistee & N. E. R. Co., 186 Mich. 501.

Acts and omissions of fellow-servants for which employer is liable under Federal Employers' Liability Act, see note, 8 N. C. C. A. 167-184.

§ 55a. Concurrent negligence of master and fellow-servant.

¶ 593. An abandoned railroad switch was reopened and used without restoring the switch lights and without notifying engineers of trains, who, when passing an existing switch, are required to slow up. Held, that if the presence of the lights would have prevented the train of which plaintiff was engineer from running into the switch whereby he was injured, the company's negligence in not having lights was a concurrent cause of the accident and plaintiff could recover if he did not know of the reopening, though the switch was left unlocked by a trespasser or fellow-servant.—Town v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 84 Mich. 214.

¶ 594. Where it appears that plaintiff employee was injured by falling over a pile of gravel which had fallen from a car being moved in defendant railway company's yard, and that the pile of gravel had been allowed to remain in said yard for a period of from two to four days, defendant cannot escape liability for its failure to maintain a safe place for its employees, on the ground that such duty had been delegated to the section gang, who were fellow-servants of plaintiff.—Gillespie v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 150 Mich. 308.

¶ 596. An action will lie by an employee against his master for injuries sustained by reason of the concurring negligence of the master and of a fellow-servant.—McDonald v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 108 Mich. 7.

¶ 597. A suburban street railway employee engaged in construction work, who sustained injury as the result of a car of his company on which he was being transported, running into an open unguarded switch at full speed, was entitled to recover even if the motorman was negligent and even if he might have been regarded as a fellow-servant of such employee, as the fault if any was in failing to provide a safe system in running the cars.—Noe v. Rapid Ry. Co., 133 Mich. 152.

¶ 598. An employee injured without fault on his part, may recover therefor against the master who is negligent though the negligence of a fellow-servant contributed to the injury.—Lockwood v. Tennant, 137 Mich. 305.

¶ 599. An employee may recover for the negligence of his employer, though the negligence of a fellow-servant contributes to the injury.—De Kallands v. Washtenaw Home Tel. Co., 153 Mich. 25.

¶ 600. Where the negligence of the master concurs with the negligence of a fellow-servant in producing a personal injury, the latter's negligence does not preclude plaintiff's recovery.—Menere v. Copper Range Consol. Co., 169 Mich. 367.

¶ 601. Plaintiff's intestate got upon the cage at the mine shaft to ascend. A fellow-servant got on at the same time with an iron pipe or rod. The cage was not provided with handholds, as required by section 15, Act No. 100, Pub. Acts 1905. During the ascent the pipe got entangled with the wall of the shaft, the occupants were thrown to the floor of the cage, and the deceased was killed between the cage and the wall. Held, that the fact that the negligence of the fellow-servant in carrying the pipe concurred with the negligence of the master in failing to provide the handholds did not relieve the defendant of liability, where the absence of the handholds may well have been a proximate cause of the death.—Kleinfelt v. J. H. Somers Coal Co., 156 Mich. 473.

¶ 602. Plaintiff was injured by falling into a chute or raise while employed in the mine. Held, the duty of the defendant to place a light at the raise was part of his duty to provide a safe place to work, and plaintiff was not barred from recovery of damages on the theory that the failure to place the light there was an act of a fellow-servant.—Kaukola v. Oliver Iron Mining Co., 159 Mich. 689.

¶ 603. Where the deceased left his usual duties, took a scow and went out into a stream for the purpose of repairing a dam in process of construction, recovery for his death by drowning is not defeated by the fact that a fellow-servant failed to warn him of hidden dangers, where the superintendent stood near by and failed to give such warning.—Snow v. Escanaba Power Co., 162 Mich. 579.

¶ 604. Where a plaintiff operating defendant's hand feeding rip-saw machine knows that the tailer has nothing to do with the operation of the machine, and that his duties are of the simplest character, requiring no instructions, he has no right to recover for an injury due to the failure of said tailer to shut off the power upon signal from the plaintiff, on the ground that defendant was negligent in not instructing said tailer what to do in the event of such an emergency.—Burton v. Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co., 166 Mich. 45.

§ 55b. Care in selection and retention of employees.

Statutory provisions regulating employment of children, see ante § 35.

¶ 605. Employers are bound to have safe rules of business, use care in selecting their immediate agents, and remove such persons or change such regulations as they believe to be unfit.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Dolan, 32 Mich. 510.

¶ 606. Employers are not bound to treat an agent as incompetent unless for some error or misconduct going to his general fitness.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Dolan, 32 Mich. 510.

¶ 607. A master cannot, by delegating it to another, relieve himself of the duty of exercising due care in the employment and retention of competent servants, and, if he does delegate it to a general manager, foreman or superintendent, he remains responsible.—Quincy Mining Co. v. Kitts, 42 Mich. 34.

¶ 609. A master does not insure the competency of his servants, but contracts to use all ordinary care in their selection and retention.—Lewis v. Emery, 108 Mich. 641.

¶ 610. A master is not responsible for the acts of a fellow-servant unless there is evidence to show that the master was at fault in employing an incompetent servant.—Mc-

Clure v. Detroit Southern R. Co., 146 Mich. 457.

¶ 611. The law of master and servant with reference to fellow-servants does not sanction the doctrine that before a man may be employed he must have attained the highest standard of skill and never fail to do the right thing under the circumstances.—Kellogg v. Stephens Lumber Co., 125 Mich. 222.

¶ 612. Due care in the selection of employees is "such care as, in view of the consequences that may result from negligence on the part of employees, is fairly commensurate with the perils or dangers likely to be encountered."— Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines, 115 Mich. 629.

¶ 613. In an action for wrongful death caused by the alleged incompetence of the yardmaster, held that the degree of care required is to be determined by the business itself; that while one might be competent and qualified to act as yardmaster of a small station, he might be totally unfitted to take charge of a large yard with many tracks, and where many trains were arriving and departing daily.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 46 Mich. 176.

¶ 614. Whether a yardmaster and a switchman are or are not fellow-servants of a railroad company, the company is liable for such injuries to the switchman as result from the yardmasters' incompetency.—Lee v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 87 Mich. 574.

Evidence as to master's knowledge or notice of defects, see post §§ 64d, 65f.

Notice to agent while serving predecessor as affecting principal, see Agency ¶ 447.

¶ 615. Employers have a right to trust that an agent or officer carefully chosen will use good judgment in making his appointments and doing his own duties, and to rest in that belief until, in the exercise of the general vigilance which devolves on them, they find they have erred.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Dolan, 32 Mich. 510.

¶ 616. The master is not liable if the servant whose carelessness caused the injury is not shown to be incompetent.—Peterson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 67 Mich. 102.

¶ 617. An employer is liable for injuries to servants that result from the negligence of incompetent fellow-servants, if he was negligent in selecting the latter, or if he retained them after notice of their incompetency.—Harrison v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 79 Mich. 409; Lee v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 87 Mich. 574.

¶ 618. Personal presence of officers and directors all along the line of a railroad being impossible, subordinates with more or less discretionary authority are indispensable; and the company has a right to trust that an agent or officer carefully chosen will use good judgment in making his own appointments and doing his own duties, and is not bound to treat an employee as incompetent unless for some error or misconduct going to his general fitness for the place.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Dolan, 32 Mich. 510.

¶ 619. If a locomotive engineer has for several months habitually used intoxicating liquors to such an extent that those who come in contact with him notice his condition, the failure of his superiors to notice it, and their omission to make such inquiries as would disclose it, is negligence.—Hilts v. Chicago & G. T. Ry., 55 Mich. 437.

¶ 620. Where any one of fair intelligence and the requisite physical ability is competent to perform a certain class of work, an employer is not bound to inquire into the experience of an employee who is hired to perform such work, and who possesses those qualifications, or give instructions in regard to the work.—Timm v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 98 Mich. 226.

¶ 621. Notice to the caller whose business it is merely to call the conductors in a certain order when trains are ready, and, if one cannot go, to call the next, of a special temporary incapacity of a conductor called by him, is not notice to the company.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Dolan, 32 Mich. 510.

¶ 622. Knowledge on the part of the foreman in the core room of an iron foundry, who is charged with the duty of directing employees where to go and assist the molders in filling the molds, that boys of the age and size of one so sent are competent to perform said work, and that said boy has performed it for six months to the satisfaction of all with whom he has worked, justifies the foreman in the assumption that he is dealing with a boy of the average size and strength, ordinarily competent to do the work, and who has shown himself competent, and in instructing said boy to do said work, notwithstanding his statement, made in answer to such instruction, that he is not strong enough to do it.—Jungnitsch v. Michigan Malleable Iron Co., 105 Mich. 270.

¶ 623. Plaintiff, a station agent of defendant railway, was injured by a conductor of defendant while they were engaged in unloading a freight car. The conductor was under the influence of liquor. The evidence showed that in the month before the accident the defendant had learned of the conductor's drinking habits, and has received his promise to quit them. Held, this fact did not excuse defendant from the duty of seeing that the conductor did not continue in such habits, where his excesses were notorious.—Johnson v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 162 Mich. 301.

¶ 624. Knowledge by a railroad company that a conductor uses intoxicating liquors as a beverage without notice or knowledge of incompetency therefrom is insufficient ground at common law on which to base recovery for an injury to a brakeman caused by the act of the conductor in signalling the engineer without the knowledge of the brakeman to back into a car on which the brakeman was preparing the coupling.—Wallin v. Arcadia & B. River Ry. Co., 172 Mich. 466.

¶ 625. An employer is justified in disregarding a warning given by an employee, that there would be an accident unless another employee was given a man instead of a boy, to help him, where there was no statement of any specific instance of misconduct or incompetency calling for such warning.—Jackson v. Schillinger Bros. Co., 182 Mich. 504, 7 N. C. C. A. 576.

§ 55d. Who deemed fellow-servants or co-employees.

¶ 626. The doctrine of the nonliability of the master for injuries sustained by a servant through the negligence of his fellow-servant has no application unless the one injured and the one at fault were engaged in the same general employment.—Sadowski v. Michigan Car Co., 84 Mich. 100.

¶ 627. The general rule in this state is that the question whether or not one is a fellow-servant is to be settled by the nature of the act, rather than the rank of the respective servants.—LaBarre v. Grand Trunk W. Ry. Co., 133 Mich. 192.

¶ 628. The criterion of the fellow-servant rule is the delegability of the duty involved; if it is a delegable one the fellow-servant rule may apply, but if it is not delegable the master is liable whatever may be the relative rank of the plaintiff and the negligent other servant.—Page v. Battle Creek Pure Food Co., 142 Mich. 17.

¶ 629. All who serve the same master, work under the same control, derive their authority and compensation from the same common source, and are engaged in the same general business, though it may be in different grades or departments of it, are fellow-servants.—McCauley v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 167 Mich. 230; Kangas v. Cleveland Cliffs Iron Co., 188 Mich. 255.

¶ 630. A building owner employed workmen under direction of an architect. He furnished suitable materials to competent carpenters to construct scaffolding to be used by them in putting the cornice upon his house. Afterward the same scaffolding was used by painters hired to paint the cornice. It fell injuring one of the painters. Held the carpenters and painters were fellow-servants.—Hoar v. Merritt, 62 Mich. 386.

¶ 631. A scaffold builder employed by a large building contractor is a fellow-employee of a bricklayer employed by the same contractor.—Landowski v. Chapoton, 137 Mich. 429.

¶ 632. A boat's mate and her captain are fellow-servants, and if one is injured through the other's negligence the owner of the boat is not liable.—Caniff v. Blanchard Nav. Co., 66 Mich. 638.

¶ 633. Whether one who works at odd jobs around a mill-yard wherein are his employer's sawmill and salt-block, and who occasionally loads salt on a barge for market, is the fellow-servant of men in the salt-warehouse handling barrels, so as to preclude his recovery for injuries received from a descending elevator through their negligence, quære.—Sell v. Charles Rietz & Bros.' Lumber Co., 70 Mich. 479, affirming judgment by equal division.

¶ 634. Plaintiff was employed by a builder of steel vessels to go over the work, and supply omitted rivets, after the riveters of the plates of the vessel had completed their work. Artisans of various kinds were employed to do their respective shares of the work. The building of stagings, the erection of derricks, and the raising of materials were parts of the necessary work, incident to and simultaneous with, and in fact a part of, the building of the vessel. All was under the charge of one superintendent, who directed the different gangs through their respective foremen. Plaintiff, while working upon a scaffold, was injured by the breaking of a weak cross-piece, selected and used by the carpenters who built the scaffold. In a suit to recover damages for the injury, there was nothing to indicate a contract on the part of the defendant to provide a safe scaffold to work upon, or an assumption by it of that duty. Held, that plaintiff and the carpenters who built the scaffold were fellow-servants in such a sense as to prevent the application of the rule that it is the duty of the master to provide a reasonably safe place for the servant to work.—Beesley v. Wheeler & Co., 103 Mich. 196.

¶ 635. Employees in charge of sets of rollers in a flour roller mill are fellow-servants and the fact that two such employees by direction of the foreman, took out dull rollers and put in sharp ones does not change the relation so as to make the master liable for injury to the employee in charge of that set of rollers, though the injury may have been caused by negligence in replacing the rollers.—Frazee v. Stott, 120 Mich. 624.

¶ 636. Where there was a question as to negligence in not furnishing necessary lights for night work, and it appeared that defendant had employed an electrician with abundant supplies of wire and lamps to place lamps where required, and there was an abundant supply of torches for the use of employees, those entrusted with the duty of placing or supplying the lights furnished are fellow-servants of one who was injured in the course of his employment and the master is not liable for any alleged negligence on their part.—Livingstone v. Saginaw Plate Glass Co., 146 Mich. 236.

¶ 637. Where a corporation engaged in the erection of bridges employs an experienced man to erect a bridge, and such man employs the necessary help, their wages being paid by him with money furnished by the corporation, he is a fellow-servant of the helpers employed by him.—Corey v. Joliet Bridge & Iron Co., 151 Mich. 558.

¶ 638. In an action for personal injuries, it appeared that plaintiff was employed in a mill, and that he was directed by the master mechanic, whose orders he was bound to obey, to climb upon the machinery to extinguish a fire caused by friction. The master mechanic assured plaintiff that the machinery would remain stopped while he was on it, but the machine unexpectedly started, whereby plaintiff was injured. Held, that such assurance was an act of a fellow-servant.—Maxwell v. Elk Cement & Lime Co., 157 Mich. 631.

¶ 639. Where plaintiff, a saleswoman in defendant's store, is injured by an electric fan falling from a show case which is being moved by the floor manager, the injury being the result of the negligence of a fellow-servant, defendant is not liable.—McBroom v. B. Siegel & Co., 175 Mich. 186.

¶ 640. In determining whether a plaintiff sixteen years old is a fellow-servant of one with whom he was working, consideration may be given to the likelihood of the plaintiff to defer to the judgment of this other person placed there to direct his work.—Belmer v. Boyne City Tanning Co., 160 Mich. 669.

¶ 641. In an action for personal injuries sustained by a woodsman as the result of a tree falling upon him which was felled by a member of a gang working near him, held that the employee who felled the tree was a fellow-servant of the plaintiff.—Stone v. Bennett, 194 Mich. 441.

§ 55e. ——Infants or others employed in violation of statute.

¶ 642. Where the law forbids that a person of a particular class shall be employed as a servant, he cannot be regarded as a fellow-servant.—Syneszewski v. Schmidt, 153 Mich. 438.

¶ 643. Where a child under sixteen years of age is employed in dangerous work in violation of Pub. Acts 1901, No. 113, he is not a fellow-servant with a servant who directs him to do the particular work on which he is injured, but such servant acts in giving the directions as a representative of the master.—Daim v. Bryant Paper Co., 157 Mich. 550.

§ 55f. Vice principals or representatives of master and other employees.

¶ 644. The fact that one employee has authority to hire and discharge other employees is not conclusive of his relation of fellow-servant to other employees.—Belmer v. Boyne City Tanning Co., 160 Mich. 669.

¶ 645. Where a servant is exposed to danger not in the line of the duties he has engaged to perform, by one whom the master has placed over him, and to whose orders he is subjected, this wrongful act of his superior may be treated as the wrongful act of the master.—Belmer v. Boyne City Tanning Co., 160 Mich. 669.

¶ 646. Where defendant has given an employee full control of erecting a building and of the men employed thereon, he is liable for an injury to a workman from such superior employee's negligence, even though such superior himself worked about the building.—Slater v. Chapman, 67 Mich. 523.

¶ 647. One to whom his employer had given the general supervision of a coal and freight business, including the unloading of vessels laden with coal, and the employment and direction of men for that purpose, was not a fellow-servant of such men so as to absolve the master from responsibility to them for his negligence in constructing a scaffold of such poor material that it broke and caused injury to a servant of such employer.—Brown v. Gilchrist, 80 Mich. 56.

¶ 648. In the absence of the officers and corporators of a corporation, it may be inferred that a servant who assumes to and does discharge the duty of keeping the machinery and appliances necessary to the prosecution of the corporate business in repair is the representative of the corporation in so doing.—Fox v. Spring Lake Iron Co., 89 Mich. 387.

¶ 649. Where it is the duty of the head engineer of a blast-furnace to make repairs in certain hoisting apparatus, his neglect, knowing of a defect therein, to take precautions against an accident from such defect to an employee who, under his orders, is repairing the same, is that of his employer; he is not a mere fellow-servant of such employee.—Fox v. Spring Lake Iron Co., 89 Mich. 387.

¶ 650. Defendant's superintendent, to whom it had delegated general authority to manage the business, including the duty to see that the machinery in its factory was kept in good order, is held to have been plaintiff's superior servant while starting a planer which plaintiff was oiling, and thereby causing the injury complained of.—Shumway v. Walworth & N. Mfg. Co., 98 Mich. 411.

¶ 651. The general superintendent and manager of a company was not a fellow-servant of a construction laborer employed by such company, but was a vice-principal, for whose negligence resulting in injury to such laborer, such company was responsible. —Milbourne v. Arnold Elec. Power Station Co., 140 Mich. 316.

¶ 652. A superintendent having charge of four or five hundred men doing concrete construction work, with authority to employ and discharge men, and to give directions for the work, is a vice principal, and not a fellow-servant of a man under his charge.—Brown v. Lennane, 155 Mich. 686.

¶ 653. Defendant sent an experienced employee, one Berlin, to instruct plaintiff's intestate, an employee, how to charge a soda water tank. Held, the defendant was liable for the negligence of Berlin whereby the tank exploded and killed plaintiff's intestate, as Berlin was not acting as a fellow-servant.—McDonnell v. Central Drug Co., 160 Mich. 455.

¶ 654. Where a millwright in a paper mill sends assistants to repair the belt used to run the machinery in the washing vats, they are not fellow-servants of an employee whose duties are to go into the vat and keep it clean after each operation.—Courtois v. King Paper Co., 172 Mich. 305.

¶ 655. Where one who had general charge of the construction of a bridge ordered a workman to use a certain piece of timber in the erection of a scaffold which scaffold broke because the timber so selected was defective, held, that the superintendent was a vice-principal and not a fellow-servant of the workman injured.—Buck v. Western Concrete Bridge Co., 177 Mich. 646.

¶ 656. Where defendant's superintendent ordered the foreman to take decedent, who was employed as a hoisting engineer and was inexperienced as an iron worker, to do some riveting on a smokestack eighty-five feet from the ground, and while the foreman and decedent were at work upon a scaffold, the latter fell to the ground and was killed, it was held that the negligence complained of was that of the superintendent, and hence not that of a fellow-servant.—Lobenstein v. Whitehead & Kales Iron Works, 179 Mich. 279.

¶ 657. An employee, to whom is delegated the master's duty of providing a safe place for his servants to work, is a vice-principal; and the fact that in the discharge of his regular duties he is a fellow-servant of an injured employee will not relieve the employer from liability.—Maki v. Isle Royale Copper Co., 180 Mich. 624.

¶ 658. The superintendent of the construction department of a large manufacturing company is a vice-principal, and his employer is answerable for his negligence in not properly guarding the work of chipping iron from a machine while being installed under the former's direction, so as to protect from flying chips employees of other departments who, in the discharge of their duties, have occasion to pass that way. (Ostrander and Kuhn, JJ., dissenting.)—Webb v. Buick Motor Co., 182 Mich. 551.

¶ 659. Those employed by the master to provide or to keep in repair the place, or to supply the machinery and tools, for labor, are engaged in a different employment from those who are to use the place or appliances when provided, and are not, as to each other, fellow-servants.—Sadowski v. Michigan Car Co., 84 Mich. 100.

§ 55g. Foremen and other employees.

¶ 660. Ordinarily a foreman of a shop is not a vice-principal.—Burgess v. Humphrey Bookcase Co., 156 Mich. 345.

¶ 661. A common laborer employed in a lumber-yard was held not to have been a fellow-servant with the yard foreman and his men, who by the direction of the superintendent dug a ditch in which to lay a water-pipe, and left it uncovered, whereby the laborer was injured.—Sadowski v. Michigan Car Co., 84 Mich. 100.

¶ 662. The foreman of a mill whose duty it is to keep machinery supplied with guards cannot be regarded as the fellow-servant of workmen injured for want of guards.—Roux v. Blodgett & Davis Lumber Co., 94 Mich. 607.

¶ 663. The foreman of a car shop who works with the men under his charge is a fellow-servant of the men as to all acts that it is not the master's duty to perform; e. g., in hoisting a car body by tackle.—Findlay v. Russel Wheel & Foundry Co., 108 Mich. 286.

¶ 664. While finishing the work of putting elevators into a building defendant's foreman and plaintiff had to do some work in one of the elevators, and before beginning it the foreman went to the ground floor and secured the elevator and then started to work with plaintiff. Soon after a man in charge of the elevator, who was ignorant of the foreman's action, started it, and plaintiff was hurt. Held, that as the injury was caused by the neglect of the foreman, plaintiff's fellow-servant, to take the proper precautions to stop the elevator, there could be no recovery.—Andre v. Winslow Bros.' Elevator Co., 117 Mich. 560.

¶ 665. A mill-owner who has furnished a safe place, proper machinery and appliances, and competent men to perform the work, is not liable to an employee whose hand is crushed through the alleged negligence of fellow-servants in replacing mill rollers by direction of the foreman, this not being work which the master was bound to superintend. —Frazee v. Stott, 120 Mich. 624.

¶ 666. It is not the grade of the servant but the employment that determines the question of fellow-servants and a foreman running a spoke lathe for the moment to adjust it so that the proper size spoke may be turned out is a fellow-servant with the regular attendant at the machine injured while oiling it during the foreman's trial.—Wellihan v. National Wheel Co., 128 Mich. 1.

¶ 667. The foreman of a sawmill with power to employ men and to direct their labor, who is also engaged part of the time in manual labor, is a fellow-servant of an employee injured through the foreman's negligent direction as to the conduct of certain work.—Lepan v. Hall, 128 Mich. 523.

¶ 668. A laborer in a warehouse engaged in shoveling and wheeling salt is a fellow-servant of the foreman of the men so engaged so as to render the employer not liable for injuries sustained through the action of workmen in breaking off a part of a pile of salt where the foreman is not a general manager or superintendent but engaged merely to boss the men in one of the various departments.—Mikolojczak v. North American Chemical Co., 129 Mich. 80.

¶ 669. An employee in a punch shop was injured by the fall of a steel plate, alleged to have been caused by a nut fitting the bolt too loosely, the bolt being used to raise the steel plate. The bolt and nut were obtained by the foreman from another foreman, and, after being examined, were fastened to the plate, which, when lifted, dropped because the nut came off. Held that he could not recover since it required no special skill to see if the nut fitted the bolt, and the negligence, if any, was that of a fellow-servant.—Flaws v. West Bay City Shipbuilding Co., 132 Mich. 169.

¶ 670. The placing of an emery wheel upon the wrong machine by a foreman of a machine shop, so that it burst on account of high speed, is the act of a fellow-servant.—Randa v. Detroit Screw Works, 134 Mich. 343.

¶ 671. An employer was bound to use due care that a water cooler furnished for the use of his employees should in the first instance be reasonably safe for use, and he was chargeable with the negligence of any subordinate to whom he delegated that duty, and in performing such duty the foreman was not acting as a fellow-servant of an employee who drank poison which had been placed in the cooler at the foreman's direction for purposes of cleaning, but was acting as a representative of the employer.—Geller v. Briscoe Mfg. Co., 136 Mich. 330.

¶ 672. One of the grade of foreman in "charge of the mason department on construction and repairs" of the master's ovens, who had under him a subforeman in immediate charge, was fellow-servant of a mason sent into the inside of an oven to make repairs in so far as the first named superior assumed to turn on a blower for the purpose of cooling the oven and in so doing sent in a blast of air which stirred up dust and ashes injuring plaintiff's eyes.—Page v. Battle Creek Pure Food Co., 142 Mich. 17.

¶ 673. A laborer and a foreman of a sawmill engaged in moving a loaded car along a side track are fellow-servants in such work. —Younggren v. I. Stephenson Co., 150 Mich. 488.

¶ 674. The foreman of an electric lighting company does not become a vice principal by an agreement with an electrician to watch a certain switch box, and see that the switch was not closed.—Guest v. Edison Illuminating Co., 150 Mich. 438.

¶ 675. A company engaged in the installation of electric appliances is not liable for the negligence of a foreman who is the fellow-servant of an electrician injured.—Guest v. Edison Illuminating Co., 150 Mich. 438.

¶ 676. A servant cannot recover for injuries sustained by the falling of iron plates improperly piled and carried to the deck of a steamboat in process of construction by defendant, a builder of steamboats, the duty of diligently carrying and piling plates being a delegable duty, though the work was in charge of a foreman.—Amoe v. Great Lakes Engineering Works, 151 Mich. 212.

¶ 677. Defendant put a foreman in charge of a gang of men to keep in repair a certain portion of its line of wires used to transmit electric power. The foreman had power to hire and discharge men, to make requisitions for supplies, and to direct the work. Plaintiff, upon being employed by defendant, informed his foreman that he did not know how to handle hot or live wires. The foreman promised him that either he or his assistant would inform plaintiff when they came to poles whether the wires thereon were dangerous. Plaintiff was sent up a pole to solder a dead wire and, while attempting to straddle it, rose up too high and touched a live wire and was injured. Held, the foreman had authority to make said promise and was not a fellow-servant of plaintiff so as to exempt defendant from liability for the foreman's neglect to warn plaintiff.—Argersinger v. Commonwealth Power Co., 164 Mich. 282. (Hooker, J., dissenting.)

ders to be used in the work. At the direction of the foreman plaintiff used a straight ladder found in the building belonging to the third person, and while using the same was injured. Held, the foreman and plaintiff were fellow-servants so as to preclude plaintiff's recovery.—Fellows v. Stevens, 170 Mich. 13. (Bird, J., dissenting.)

¶ 679. If a foreman having permission to use lumber not belonging to the master selects a defective plank therefrom to use in building a scaffold when there was sufficient other material on hand from which a proper plank could be selected, or if there was no other material at hand when the scaffold was erected but there was proper material that could be used to replace the plank when its scaffold was removed and rebuilt, a servant stepping on the plank who is injured by its breaking may recover.—Bittner v. Howie Roofing Co., 176 Mich. 674.

¶ 680. A foreman in charge of a gang of men engaged in unloading logs from cars is a fellow-servant of the driver of a team engaged in moving the car from place to place.—Hilgbrandt v. Oval Wood Dish Co., 180 Mich. 43.

¶ 681. A promise of a foreman to have sufficient power to operate machinery with safety is merely the promise of a fellow-servant, and failure to keep such promise is a fellow-servant's negligence, where the defect in the power was due to inadequacy of boiler capacity, and there was nothing to show that the foreman had any authority to get a new boiler, or that the servant supposed or was told that he could or would get such boiler.—Burgess v. Humphrey Bookcase Co., 156 Mich. 345.

§ 55h. Employees in different departments.

¶ 682. A Detroit fire engine driver is not a fellow-servant of the board of public works of that city so that he may not recover for an injury to him arising from a defect in a public street and received by him while performing his duty, which it was the board's duty to repair.—Coots v. City of Detroit, 75 Mich. 628.

¶ 683. A janitress employed by defendant, owner of a building, and injured by the fall of an elevator in said building while riding in the same in the morning to her work on the third floor, where she is accustomed to change her clothes before beginning her labor, is not a fellow-servant of the operator of said elevator so as to preclude recovery for said injury.—Mirabile v. Simon J. Murphy Co., 169 Mich. 522.

¶ 684. Where defendant's repair man fails to put a cotter pin in the lever controlling the clutch apparatus of a milling machine, by reason of which plaintiff employee is injured, the doctrine of fellow-servant does not apply so as to deprive plaintiff of the right to recover.—Deary v. Hecla Co., 161 Mich. 677.

¶ 685. Those employed to make a road safe for drawing logs are engaged in making a safe place, and are not fellow-servants with a teamster driving a team over it.—Scoop v. W. H. White Co., 182 Mich. 539.

§ 55i. Employees of separate masters in same work.

¶ 686. Plaintiff's decedent was employed by the Pere Marquette Railroad as a yardmaster. The defendant railroad used the Pere Marquette tracks up to a point of a mile from the latter's passenger station. The decedent had nothing to do with the defendant's trains except to cut off a sleeper which was then taken in charge by the Pere Marquette, and became its sleeper. Held, the decedent was not a fellow-servant of the defendant's train men.—Jackson v. Detroit & M. Ry. Co., 161 Mich. 163.

¶ 687. A plaintiff employed by a carpenter contractor in work upon a bay window is not the fellow-servant of one employed by a painting contractor in painting such window.—Haxer v. Griessel, 162 Mich. 310.

¶ 688. Where an automobile company employs a person to inspect and test motors at a factory supplying the same, such employee and an employee of the factory assisting in the tests are not fellow-servants as they are not servants of the same master.—Johnson v. E. C. Clark Motor Co., 173 Mich. 277.

¶ 689. A teamster in the employ of a trucking company is not a fellow-servant of an employee of the consignee of goods engaged in unloading same from railroad car to the truck.—Shadduck v. Grand Rapids & I. Ry. Co., 179 Mich. 433.

§ 55j. Railroad employees.

Statutory provisions regulating employment of railroad workers, see ante § 36.

¶ 690. If a railroad company has used proper diligence in choosing competent servants, it is not liable in damages for an injury to one of them caused by the carelessness of another.—Gardner v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 58 Mich. 584.

¶ 691. Train men and section hands are fellow-servants within the rule precluding recovery by one such servant for injury through another's negligence.—Schaible v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 97 Mich. 318.

¶ 692. If, while an employee is helping at unloading logs from a car, logs are rolled upon him by the other workmen on the car of their own volition and without the authority or direction of the roadmaster, this is an act of fellow-servants, for which he cannot recover.—Roepcke v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 100 Mich. 541.

¶ 693. Where the collision in which plaintiff, a railroad engineer, was injured was caused by a flat-car moving from a side track out upon the main track, it was held that if the motion which was the cause of the flat-car's being hauled out was imparted to it by a freight train which had shortly before backed upon the side track, such fact might establish negligence on the part of the men in charge of the freight train, but that for such negligence there could be no recovery against the railroad company, it being the negligence of fellow-servants.—Hewitt v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 67 Mich. 61.

¶ 694. Where the fireman on a freight train was hurt in consequence of the train being ditched through the engineer's neglect to obey signals, which he saw and was bound by the company's rules to observe, the company was not held liable.—Henry v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 49 Mich. 495.

¶ 695. Where the train dispatcher has telegraphed a report of a washout on the right of way to the station agent, whose duty was to report the danger to the train men on a repair crew, the railroad company had performed its duty, and is not liable for the negligence of the station agent in failing to inform the train men.—Graham v. Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 151 Mich. 629.

¶ 696. A tower man was employed at the crossing of two railroads, his pay coming half from each road. He had absolute control of the passing of trains by means of an interlocker and derailer. Held, his employment was not that of a train dispatcher, but was analogous to that of a switchman, and he was the fellow-servant of an engineer of one of the roads.—Stever v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 160 Mich. 207.

¶ 697. A telegraph operator, in receiving a dispatch from the train dispatcher, and in transcribing and delivering same to an engineer, is a fellow-servant of said engineer, and the latter cannot recover for injuries suffered in a collision due to a negligent mistake of the operator in transcribing the dispatch.—Rogers v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 166 Mich. 42.

§ 55k. ——Vice principals or agents of company and other employees.

¶ 698. Where, by direction of the company's division superintendent, an abandoned switch has been reopened and used, failure to notify the engineers of trains or to restore the switch lights must be regarded as the negligence of the company and not of the section-master, a fellow-servant of an injured engineer, and the company is liable.—Town v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 84 Mich. 214.

¶ 699. A railroad station agent selecting cars to be loaded, and who furnishes an open rack car for the transportation of refuse from a planing mill, is not the fellow-servant of a section man injured by the derailment of a hand car caused by a piece of wood which had fallen from the car, since the duty of selecting proper cars cannot be delegated.—McLean v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 137 Mich. 482.

¶ 700. A station agent was employed and paid by two railroads crossing each other. The agent was given authority to hire and discharge the tower men at the intersection, but had no power to prescribe rules governing them, these being promulgated by the companies. Plaintiff engineer was injured by the alleged negligence of the tower man in giving signals. Held, the station agent was not the master of the tower man or the vice principal of the defendant railroad, so as to render defendant liable.—Stever v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 160 Mich. 207.

¶ 701. An assistant roadmaster who in the absence of the conductor was in charge of a train from which rails were being unloaded was not a fellow-servant of a section man engaged in unloading such rails, but was a vice-principal.—LaBarre v. Grand Trunk W. Ry. Co., 133 Mich. 192.

§ 702. A section man specially directed to mount a stepladder on top of a box car and to cut an overhead trolley wire is not a fellow-servant of the division roadmaster who directs him to do it.—Walker v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 104 Mich. 606, per Montgomery, J., and McGrath, C. J.

¶ 703. The duty to furnish a safe place for its employees to work being one that a railroad company cannot delegate so as to relieve itself from responsibility, section men within the scope of whose duties it may have been to remove from the track ice which subsequently causes the derailing of a car and the consequent killing of a brakeman, are not fellow-servants of his with respect to the performance of such duties.—Balhoff v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 106 Mich. 606.

¶ 704. A train-dispatcher who has absolute control over a division of a railroad, so far as the running and operating of trains is concerned, is not a "fellow-servant" with other employees acting under his orders.—Hunn v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 78 Mich. 513.

¶ 705. A yardmaster, who has full charge of the yards of a railroad company and who hires and discharges men and assigns them to their work, is not their fellow-servant, but is the agent or vice-principal of the company, and notice to him of defects in appliances and of the incompetency of a fireman handling a switch-engine is notice to the company, and upon his promise to remedy those evils a switchman, complaining of them, has a right to rely for a reasonable time and to a reasonable extent, and if he continues in the service relying on such promise the rule that an employee accepts the risks of his employment when he continues in it knowing of defects does not apply, unless the company fails for an unreasonable time to make repairs, etc.—Lyttle v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 84 Mich. 289.

¶ 706. In an action by a switchman for injuries received because of an unblocked frog while uncoupling cars, it is no defense that defendant had employed men to see that the frogs in its yards are kept blocked, and that it furnished the necessary material; the statutory duty cannot be delegated to an employee so as to relieve the employer, and the negligence of the former in this regard is that of the latter.—Ashman v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 90 Mich. 567.

¶ 707. An assistant road-master controlling a gang of men with power of direction and discharge is a superior servant, and for his negligence the employer is liable.—Harrison v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 79 Mich. 409; Palmer v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 93 Mich. 363.

¶ 708. A servant, to whom the master has delegated the care and management of the entire business or of a distinct department thereof, so as to charge him with the performance of duties toward subordinates that the law imposes upon the master, stands in the latter's place, and the rule of respondeat superior applies to render the master liable for injury where this superior servant, abusing his authority, orders an inferior to perform work differing from that for which he was employed.—Harrison v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 79 Mich. 409.

§ 55l. ——Inspector and other employees.

¶ 709. A car inspector, whose duty it is to inspect cars and their apparatus, is not a brakeman's fellow-servant, and the company is liable for his negligence in permitting the putting on the car of a defective brake-chain if injury results to the brakeman.—Morton v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co., 81 Mich. 423.

¶ 710. A brakeman on a freight train, and a car inspector charged by the common employer with the duty of inspecting cars received from other companies for transportation, and of seeing that they are properly loaded and in good condition, are fellow-servants.—Dewey v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 97 Mich. 329.

¶ 711. A switchman in the employ of a board composed of representatives of three railroad companies, to whose general control of a union depot, tracks, and yard, the individual companies are subject, is not a fellow-servant of a car inspector employed by one of the companies, even when the switchman is engaged in handling the business of that particular road, and a car inspector so employed does not assume the risk of injury from the negligence of such switchman, so as to preclude a recovery for his death in an action against the roads in their associate capacity.—Kastl v. Wabash R. Co., 114 Mich. 53.

¶ 712. Where a railroad employed a competent inspector to inspect cars coming in from other roads, and the inspector made a faulty inspection of the car in question, or none at all, thus failing to detect a defective stake or stakes, which latter fell upon and killed a switchman at work in the yard, there was no liability, as the inspector and the switchman were fellow-servants.—Lellis v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 124 Mich. 37.

¶ 713. Car inspectors are not such fellow-servants of a freight conductor as to relieve the railroad company from liability for injury to the conductor resulting from their negligence.—McDonald v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 132 Mich. 372.

¶ 714. Where a railroad company makes no provision for inspection of its engines except by the engineers in charge, who are expected at all practicable times to perform that duty and report defects, they must be held to be the representatives of the company.—McDonald v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 108 Mich. 7.

¶ 715. The inspector of a roadbed is not the fellow-servant of an engineer in regard to a failure to inspect.—Hamilton v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 135 Mich. 95.

§ 55m. ——Foremen and other employees.

¶ 716. The foreman of a gang of car-repairers and the engineer of a switch-engine are fellow-servants of one of the repairers, who, if he is injured through their negligence, cannot recover against the employing railroad company.—Peterson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 67 Mich. 102.

¶ 717. Whether a section foreman can be considered a fellow-servant of the men working under him so as to relieve the common employer from liability for his negligence, quære.—Hammond v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 83 Mich. 334.

¶ 718. Where a gang of section-men is propelling a hand-car along the track, the foreman's failure to send a look-out ahead near a curve to give warning of an expected train must be regarded as shared in by the section-men who voluntarily and without express orders remain on the car; and no recovery can be had for the death of one of the men from a collision.—Hammond v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 83 Mich. 334.

¶ 719. A foreman who has charge of a gravel-train, with power to hire and discharge all men working thereon, and to whom alone they can make complaint, is not a fellow-servant of said employees.—Erickson v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co., 93 Mich. 414.

¶ 720. Where, in an action against a railroad company by an employee who was one of a gang of men at work for the company under a foreman's charge, unloading and levelling dirt hauled upon its premises, and who was injured by the backing of an engine against the loaded cars from which it had been detached, the sole act of negligence alleged as ground for recovery was that the foreman failed to give notice to the men under his charge that the train was about to move, held, as he and plaintiff were fellow-servants there could be no recovery.—Schroeder v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 108 Mich. 213.

¶ 721. A section man engaged with other members of the section gang in moving a loaded car by shoving against it an empty car, was ordered by the section boss to climb upon the loaded car and set the brake, and while climbing a ladder on the loaded car to execute the order was injured by the empty car's being pushed against him. Held, that the negligence, if any, was that of the section boss or of the men under his control, all of whom were fellow-servants of the injured employee, so that he could not recover against the employer.—Gavigan v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 110 Mich. 71.

¶ 722. A roadmaster, being prevented by illness from accompanying a work train sent out to distribute railroad ties along the right of way, placed a section foreman in charge of the train, with instructions as to the loading, removing, and handling of the ties. No general power was conferred upon the foreman to make up and send out trains, to determine when and where they should go, to employ and discharge workmen, or to represent the roadmaster other than upon the particular occasion, and in accordance with his instructions. Held, that the foreman did not become a vice-principal of the company, so as to render it liable for injuries to one of the workmen resulting from the negligence of the foreman while in charge of the train.—Morch v. Toledo, S. & M. R. Co., 113 Mich. 154.

¶ 723. While the foreman of a gang of men employed in putting in a bridge may be their fellow-servant with respect to the manner of use of materials and appliances furnished by the master, or with respect to the selection of the same from among those near at hand, he represents the master when he undertakes the duty of selecting suitable materials from a supply in a warehouse eighty miles distant, and for a negligent selection, resulting in injury to an employee, the master is liable.—Thomas v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 114 Mich. 59.

¶ 724. The negligence of a conductor and brakemen in placing timbers on a flat car without complying with the rules requiring the proper securing of the timbers, and the failure of the station agent to inspect the loading, whereby the foreman of a gang of section hands at work surfacing the track was injured by a projecting timber, was the act of fellow-servants for which the railroad company, which provided safe appliances and a safe place to work, is not liable.—Miller v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 123 Mich. 374.

¶ 725. The foreman of the car department of a railroad supervising men who do repair work is the fellow-servant of one working in the woodworking department who in the line of his duties has been called out to assist in the repair of a loaded freight car.—McClure v. Detroit Southern R. Co., 146 Mich. 457.

¶ 726. Where a car repairer, before going in between two cars, was assured by the car foreman that he would be protected, and the duties of such car foreman were delegable and of a limited character, and he sometimes worked with the men, the failure of such foreman to protect plaintiff is the negligence of a fellow-servant.—Garlinghouse v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 174 Mich. 73.

¶ 727. A car repairer and a roundhouse foreman are fellow-servants.—Revolinski v. Manistee & N. E. R. Co., 186 Mich. 501.

¶ 728. Defendant railroad's foreman in charge of constructing a branch line took plaintiff and other laborers so employed and set them to work clearing up a wreck. Plaintiff was directed by the said foreman to turn the cog wheel of a derrick by taking hold of its spokes, and while so engaged was injured. Held, the foreman was a fellow-servant and not a vice principal of the plaintiff.—Peters v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 165 Mich. 217.

¶ 729. A car repairer and a roundhouse foreman are fellow-servants.—Revolinski v. Manistee & N. E. R. Co., 186 Mich. 501.

§ 55n. ——Conductors and other employees.

¶ 730. A conductor of a freight train, under whose direction a brakeman is assisting in the unloading of freight, is the fellow-servant of the brakeman.—LaPierre v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 99 Mich. 212.

¶ 731. Conductor and brakemen are fellow-servants whose acts are not independent in such a sense as to separate them from each other in the line of dangers.—Greenwald v. Marquette, H. & O. R. Co., 49 Mich. 197.

¶ 732. If a conductor of a freight train be killed through the negligence of the engineer of another train whereby a collision has been occasioned, there can be no recovery against their employer, the conductor and the engineer being fellow-servants.—Enright v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co., 93 Mich. 409.

¶ 733. Where a fireman on a passenger train while in the cab of his engine and passing a freight train on a side track was struck and injured by the projecting limb of a tree on a flat car loaded with trees, he cannot recover, the negligence, if any, being the failure of the conductor of the freight train—a fellow-servant—to see, under a rule known to the plaintiff, that the flat car was properly loaded before receiving it into his train.—Jarman v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 98 Mich. 135.

¶ 734. The failure of the brakeman or conductor of a passenger train equipped with air brakes, in the use of which they have been properly instructed, to pull the automatic cord by which the brakes are operated in response to the engineer's signal, is, as to the engineer, the negligence of a fellow-servant, for which the railroad company is not liable.—Whalen v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 114 Mich. 512.

¶ 735. A railroad company was not liable, in an action for injuries to a freight conductor who was struck by a movable platform of a milkhouse as he was climbing the ladder on a car of his moving train, where, it appears that the station agent, whose duty it was to raise and lower such platform as occasion required, had lowered the same just before the accident, and where no evidence of defect on such platform was given; since in the discharge of such duty, the station agent, as fellow-servant of the plaintiff was responsible.—Henry v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 140 Mich. 446.

¶ 736. Plaintiff was a street car conductor, and was on the running board of the car, collecting fares, while it was in motion. A section man had left the handles of a wheelbarrow loaded with bricks projecting near the track. Plaintiff in passing along got entangled therewith and was injured. Held, the case presented was not one where the defendant had failed to provide a safe place to work, but plaintiff was injured by the negligent act of a fellow-servant, and could not recover.—Wickham v. Detroit United Ry., 160 Mich. 277.

§ 55o. ——Brakemen or switchmen and other employees.

¶ 737. A boy about 17 years old was employed as brakeman by the engineer of an ore train. The engineer had power to employ and discharge brakemen, and the boy was capable and experienced in the business. The engineer directed the fireman to back the locomotive upon a side track to the train, and told the brakeman to attend a switch. He himself went to attend another switch further on. While this was being done the bell and whistle of a train on the main track near by were both sounding. The first switch was passed, and the engineer was about throwing the second when he heard an outcry and saw the brakeman under the locomotive. The brakeman died in a few minutes from his injuries, and his administrator sued the railroad company for the injury. It was proved that the brakeman knew the train was about moving back, and that there was room enough for him to perform his duties. Held, that he needed no further warning of his danger, and that the accident was due to his own negligence; also, that if the failure to sound the bell and whistle of the locomotive was negligence, it was the fault of the fireman, who was a fellow-servant of the brakeman, and for whose negligence towards a fellow-servant the company would not be liable.—Greenwald v. Marquette, H. & O. R. Co., 49 Mich. 197.

¶ 738. A brakeman cannot hold the company which employs him responsible for the failure of fellow-servants to take peculiar precautions.—Day v. Toledo, C. S. & D. R. Co., 42 Mich. 523.

¶ 739. If, owing to the engineer's negligence, the step of an engine becomes loose, whereby a brakeman attempting to board the engine is injured, such negligence is that of a fellow-servant, and the company is not liable.—Miller v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 90 Mich. 230.

¶ 740. A brakeman who in attempting to board a moving engine is injured in consequence of the step's being loose and turning may not recover in an action for negligence against the company, if he offers no evidence that the engineer whose duty it was to see to the step was incompetent or did not have the proper tools to repair the step, and where there is produced nothing to show how long the step was loose or whether the company knew of its insecurity.—Miller v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 90 Mich. 230.

¶ 741. A conductor of a freight train desired to leave two box cars on a siding, and directed a brakeman to get upon an empty flat car next to the tender, and assist in making a running switch. The brakeman mounted the flat car, and kneeled down at the rear end. The conductor climbed upon the first box car, which was attached to the flat car, and took his station at the rear, to apply the brake, in which position he was out of sight of the brakeman. The brakeman pulled the pin at the proper time, and just as he was reaching over the end of the flat car to lay it on the bumper of the detached box car, the engine suddenly started ahead, and he was thrown onto the track, and his leg so injured as to render amputation necessary. Neither the conductor nor the brakeman gave the engineer any signal to go ahead when the pin was drawn. Held, that the engineer should not have started up his engine until notified; that the sudden starting of the engine and flat car was the proximate cause of the accident, for which the engineer alone was responsible; and, being a fellow-servant of the brakeman, the railroad company was not liable for the consequent injury to the brakeman.—Stanley v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 101 Mich. 202.

¶ 742. It is no defense to a brakeman's action against a railroad company for injuries sustained because of an abrupt depression in one of the rails of its track, that the immediate cause of the accident was the negligence of the section men who were charged with the duty of keeping the track in repair; they not being the brakeman's fellow-servants in relation to that duty.—Anderson v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 107 Mich. 391.

¶ 743. Where a brakeman was injured in consequence of his stumbling against a pile of ashes and cinders dumped upon a track by a passing engine, although the proper dumping place was at the turn-table, it was held, that the fireman who did the dumping, and the section men whose duty it was to remove the ashes and cinders, were with the brakeman fellow-servants for whose negligence the company was not liable unless it had actual notice of the obstruction, or unless the same had existed so long that notice would be implied.—Loranger v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 104 Mich. 80.

¶ 744. A switchman and a crossing watchman are fellow-servants, and the latter cannot recover from the railroad company for injuries sustained by reason of the negligence of the former.—Dixon v. Grand Trunk Western Ry. Co., 135 Mich. 169.

¶ 745. Plaintiff employed in the operation of making up trains on defendant's tracks was injured by the fact that after he had been caught between a car and engine another engine was backed down upon the car. Said engine was backed in through the direction of a servant of defendant who had charge of the general operation of trains in and about the station, to give an order previous to it. Held, that plaintiff and such other employees were fellow-servants and that plaintiff was not entitled to recover.—McCarthy v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 97 Mich. 539.

¶ 746. The engineer of a switch engine [illegible] a [illegible] switch tracks [illegible] a [illegible] and another work [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

ants of members of a night shift engaged on the same work, and employed by the same master.—Kangas v. Cleveland Cliffs Iron Co., 188 Mich. 255.

¶ 759. A miner, who with another workman, is engaged in timbering up a drift so that it may be used as a passageway, and tests overhanging rock preliminary to timbering is the fellow-servant of the other workman.—Aho v. Cleveland Cliffs Iron Co., 188 Mich. 218.

¶ 760. An employer who has provided a safe place, proper appliances and competent employees fully instructed as to their duties, and who has established proper rules and regulations for the safe conduct of his business, is not liable for the negligence of an employee in failing to notify a fellow-servant of a transitory or temporary danger caused by his act which for the moment renders the environment unsafe.—Mesich v. Tamarack Min. Co., 184 Mich. 363.

¶ 761. A mining captain who has the entire management of the mine without direction or interference by the owner occupies the owner's place and is not a mere fellow-servant of a laborer employed in the mine, even though he was not appointed directly by the owner, but only by the owner's agent. And the owner is liable for his negligence.—Ryan v. Bagaley, 50 Mich. 179.

§ 55q. ——Shift or timber boss and other employees.

¶ 762. A timber boss is a fellow-servant of employees working in the shaft of a mine.—Erickson v. Victoria Copper Min. Co., 130 Mich. 476.

¶ 763. No recovery can be had for injury to an employee in a mine caused by the falling of a plank which was being lowered in the shaft by means of a rope fastened with a halfhitch around each end of the plank, the evidence being conflicting whether fastening by means of halfhitches or by means of holes bored in the plank was the customary way for lowering planks, but it appearing that augers were furnished for boring the holes and if there was negligence it was that of the timber boss, who was a fellow-servant, in failing to use the augers.—Erickson v. Victoria Copper Min. Co., 130 Mich. 476.

¶ 764. In the case of injury to a mine trammer injured by a top fall while he was loading ore upon cars and removing it as fast as it was brought to the floor by the miners, the fall being because timbers were not yet set or because ore on top of timbering had been loosened in progress of mining, it was held that, if there was any negligence, it was that of the miners or of the shift boss, who were fellow-servants of plaintiff, and whose duty it was to see to timbering.—Petaja v. Aurora Iron Min. Co., 106 Mich. 463.

¶ 765. A shift boss in a mine who fails to notify the succeeding mining crew of dangerous conditions is not a fellow-servant of the miners.—Panela v. Castile Min. Co., 177 Mich. 669.

¶ 766. The custom or rule that a mine timber boss must first go into the place where a blast is fired, inspect conditions, and notify the other timbermen does not constitute him a vice principal.—Vrelenich v. Calumet & Hecla Mining Co., 188 Mich. 407.

¶ 767. Defendant mining company directed plaintiff trammer where to work, and instructed him that he was neither employed nor paid to pinch down rock from the overhanging walls, and that he must spend no time in making the place safe in that regard; that such work should be attended to by the captain, shift boss and miners, and the place would be kept safe for him; and that he must abide by their judgment whether or not the place was safe. Held, upon injury to the plaintiff from falling rock, defendant could not urge that the negligence was that of the captain, shift boss and miners, and not its own.—Scendar v. Winona Copper Co., 169 Mich. 665.

F. RISKS ASSUMED BY SERVANT.

§ 56. In general; nature and basis of doctrine.

Risks of fellow-servants' acts or negligence, see post § 56 l.
Risks assumed by miners, see post § 56n.
Risks assumed by factory, shop, and mill employees, see post § 56o.
Risks assumed by linemen, see post § 56p.
Risks assumed by railroad employees, see post § 57.
Risks assumed under Federal Employers' Liability Act, see post § 58.
Weight and sufficiency of evidence as to assumption of risk, see post § 65k.
Jury questions as to assumption of risk, see post § 67q.
Directing verdict on ground that risk assumed, see post § 70b.
Instructions as to assumption of risk, see post § 71f.
Under Workmen's Compensation Act, see Workmen's Compensation Act.

¶ 768. The principle of assumed risks rests upon the ground that it is an implied contract that the employee shall assume all obvious dangers.—Bradburn v. Wabash R. Co., 134 Mich. 575.

¶ 769. The principle of assumed risk rests upon the ground that it is an implied contract between the employer and the employee that the employee shall assume the risk of all dangers obviously incident to his employment.—Brouseau v. Kellogg Switchboard & Supply Co., 158 Mich. 312.

¶ 770. The principle of assumed risk is applicable in cases in which the employer is fellow-servants in replacing mill rollers by direction of the foreman, this not being work which the master was bound to superintend. —Frazee v. Stott, 120 Mich. 624.

¶ 666. It is not the grade of the servant but the employment that determines the question of fellow-servants and a foreman running a spoke lathe for the moment to adjust it so that the proper size spoke may be turned out is a fellow-servant with the regular attendant at the machine injured while oiling it during the foreman's trial.—Wellihan v. National Wheel Co., 128 Mich. 1.

¶ 667. The foreman of a sawmill with power to employ men and to direct their labor, who is also engaged part of the time in manual labor, is a fellow-servant of an employee injured through the foreman's negligent direction as to the conduct of certain work.—Lepan v. Hall, 128 Mich. 523.

¶ 668. A laborer in a warehouse engaged in shoveling and wheeling salt is a fellow-servant of the foreman of the men so engaged so as to render the employer not liable for injuries sustained through the action of workmen in breaking off a part of a pile of salt where the foreman is not a general manager or superintendent but engaged merely to boss the men in one of the various departments.—Mikolojczak v. North American Chemical Co., 129 Mich. 80.

¶ 669. An employee in a punch shop was injured by the fall of a steel plate, alleged to have been caused by a nut fitting the bolt too loosely, the bolt being used to raise the steel plate. The bolt and nut were obtained by the foreman from another foreman, and, after being examined, were fastened to the plate, which, when lifted, dropped because the nut came off. Held that he could not recover since it required no special skill to see if the nut fitted the bolt, and the negligence, if any, was that of a fellow-servant.—Flaws v. West Bay City Shipbuilding Co., 132 Mich. 169.

¶ 670. The placing of an emery wheel upon the wrong machine by a foreman of a machine shop, so that it burst on account of high speed, is the act of a fellow-servant.—Randa v. Detroit Screw Works, 134 Mich. 343.

¶ 671. An employer was bound to use due care that a water cooler furnished for the use of his employees should in the first instance be reasonably safe for use, and he was chargeable with the negligence of any subordinate to whom he delegated that duty, and in performing such duty the foreman was not acting as a fellow-servant of an employee who drank poison which had been placed in the cooler at the foreman's direction for purposes of cleaning, but was acting as a representative of the employer.—Geller v. Briscoe Mfg. Co., 136 Mich. 330.

¶ 672. One of the grade of foreman in "charge of the mason department on construction and repairs" of the master's ovens, who had under him a subforeman in immediate charge, was fellow-servant of a mason sent into the inside of an oven to make repairs in so far as the first named superior assumed to turn on a blower for the purpose of cooling the oven and in so doing sent in a blast of air which stirred up dust and ashes injuring plaintiff's eyes.—Page v. Battle Creek Pure Food Co., 142 Mich. 17.

¶ 673. A laborer and a foreman of a sawmill engaged in moving a loaded car along a side track are fellow-servants in such work. —Younggren v. I. Stephenson Co., 150 Mich. 488.

¶ 674. The foreman of an electric lighting company does not become a vice principal by an agreement with an electrician to watch a certain switch box, and see that the switch was not closed.—Guest v. Edison Illuminating Co., 150 Mich. 438.

¶ 675. A company engaged in the installation of electric appliances is not liable for the negligence of a foreman who is the fellow-servant of an electrician injured.—Guest v. Edison Illuminating Co., 150 Mich. 438.

¶ 676. A servant cannot recover for injuries sustained by the falling of iron plates improperly piled and carried to the deck of a steamboat in process of construction by defendant, a builder of steamboats, the duty of diligently carrying and piling plates being a delegable duty, though the work was in charge of a foreman.—Amoe v. Great Lakes Engineering Works, 151 Mich. 212.

¶ 677. Defendant put a foreman in charge of a gang of men to keep in repair a certain portion of its line of wires used to transmit electric power. The foreman had power to hire and discharge men, to make requisitions for supplies, and to direct the work. Plaintiff, upon being employed by defendant, informed his foreman that he did not know how to handle hot or live wires. The foreman promised him that either he or his assistant would inform plaintiff when they came to poles whether the wires thereon were dangerous. Plaintiff was sent up a pole to solder a dead wire and, while attempting to straddle it, rose up too high and touched a live wire and was injured. Held, the foreman had authority to make said promise and was not a fellow-servant of plaintiff so as to exempt defendant from liability for the foreman's neglect to warn plaintiff.—Argersinger v. Commonwealth Power Co., 164 Mich. 282. (Hooker, J., dissenting.)

ders to be used in the work. At the direction of the foreman plaintiff used a straight ladder found in the building belonging to the third person, and while using the same was injured. Held, the foreman and plaintiff were fellow-servants so as to preclude plaintiff's recovery.—Fellows v. Stevens, 170 Mich. 13. (Bird, J., dissenting.)

¶ 679. If a foreman having permission to use lumber not belonging to the master selects a defective plank therefrom to use in building a scaffold when there was sufficient other material on hand from which a proper plank could be selected, or if there was no other material at hand when the scaffold was erected but there was proper material that could be used to replace the plank when its scaffold was removed and rebuilt, a servant stepping on the plank who is injured by its breaking may recover.—Bittner v. Howie Roofing Co., 176 Mich. 674.

¶ 680. A foreman in charge of a gang of men engaged in unloading logs from cars is a fellow-servant of the driver of a team engaged in moving the car from place to place.—Hilgbrandt v. Oval Wood Dish Co., 180 Mich. 43.

¶ 681. A promise of a foreman to have sufficient power to operate machinery with safety is merely the promise of a fellow-servant, and failure to keep such promise is a fellow-servant's negligence, where the defect in the power was due to inadequacy of boiler capacity, and there was nothing to show that the foreman had any authority to get a new boiler, or that the servant supposed or was told that he could or would get such boiler.—Burgess v. Humphrey Bookcase Co., 156 Mich. 345.

§ 55h. Employees in different departments.

¶ 682. A Detroit fire engine driver is not a fellow-servant of the board of public works of that city so that he may not recover for an injury to him arising from a defect in a public street and received by him while performing his duty, which it was the board's duty to repair.—Coots v. City of Detroit, 75 Mich. 628.

¶ 683. A janitress employed by defendant, owner of a building, and injured by the fall of an elevator in said building while riding in the same in the morning to her work on the third floor, where she is accustomed to change her clothes before beginning her labor, is not a fellow-servant of the operator of said elevator so as to preclude recovery for said injury.—Mirabile v. Simon J. Murphy Co., 169 Mich. 522.

¶ 684. Where defendant's repair man fails to put a cotter pin in the lever controlling the clutch apparatus of a milling machine, by reason of which plaintiff employee is injured, the doctrine of fellow-servant does not apply so as to deprive plaintiff of the right to recover.—Deary v. Hecla Co., 161 Mich. 677.

¶ 685. Those employed to make a road safe for drawing logs are engaged in making a safe place, and are not fellow-servants with a teamster driving a team over it.—Scoop v. W. H. White Co., 182 Mich. 539.

§ 55i. Employees of separate masters in same work.

¶ 686. Plaintiff's decedent was employed by the Pere Marquette Railroad as a yardmaster. The defendant railroad used the Pere Marquette tracks up to a point of a mile from the latter's passenger station. The decedent had nothing to do with the defendant's trains except to cut off a sleeper which was then taken in charge by the Pere Marquette, and became its sleeper. Held, the decedent was not a fellow-servant of the defendant's train men.—Jackson v. Detroit & M. Ry. Co., 161 Mich. 168.

¶ 687. A plaintiff employed by a carpenter contractor in work upon a bay window is not the fellow-servant of one employed by a painting contractor in painting such window.—Haxer v. Griessel, 162 Mich. 310.

¶ 688. Where an automobile company employs a person to inspect and test motors at a factory supplying the same, such employee and an employee of the factory assisting in the tests are not fellow-servants as they are not servants of the same master.—Johnson v. E. C. Clark Motor Co., 173 Mich. 277.

¶ 689. A teamster in the employ of a trucking company is not a fellow-servant of an employee of the consignee of goods engaged in unloading same from railroad car to the truck.—Shadduck v. Grand Rapids & I. Ry. Co., 179 Mich. 433.

§ 55j. Railroad employees.

Statutory provisions regulating employment of railroad workers, see ante § 36.

¶ 690. If a railroad company has used proper diligence in choosing competent servants, it is not liable in damages for an injury to one of them caused by the carelessness of another.—Gardner v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 58 Mich. 584.

¶ 691. Train men and section hands are fellow-servants within the rule precluding recovery by one such servant for injury through another's negligence.—Schaible v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 97 Mich. 318.

¶ 692. If, while an employee is helping at unloading logs from a car, logs are rolled upon him by the other workmen on the car of their own volition and without the authority or direction of the roadmaster, this is an act of fellow-servants, for which he cannot recover.—Roepcke v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 100 Mich. 541.

¶ 693. Where the collision in which plaintiff, a railroad engineer, was injured was caused by a flat-car moving from a side track out upon the main track, it was held that if the motion which was the cause of the flat-car's being hauled out was imparted to it by a freight train which had shortly before backed upon the side track, such fact might establish negligence on the part of the men in charge of the freight train, but that for such negligence there could be no recovery against the railroad company, it being the negligence of fellow-servants.—Hewitt v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 67 Mich. 61.

¶ 694. Where the fireman on a freight train was hurt in consequence of the train being ditched through the engineer's neglect to obey signals, which he saw and was bound by the company's rules to observe, the company was not held liable.—Henry v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 49 Mich. 495.

¶ 695. Where the train dispatcher has telegraphed a report of a washout on the right of way to the station agent, whose duty was to report the danger to the train men on a repair crew, the railroad company had performed its duty, and is not liable for the negligence of the station agent in failing to inform the train men.—Graham v. Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 151 Mich. 629.

¶ 696. A tower man was employed at the crossing of two railroads, his pay coming half from each road. He had absolute control of the passing of trains by means of an interlocker and derailer. Held, his employment was not that of a train dispatcher, but was analogous to that of a switchman, and he was the fellow-servant of an engineer of one of the roads.—Stever v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 160 Mich. 207.

¶ 697. A telegraph operator, in receiving a dispatch from the train dispatcher, and in transcribing and delivering same to an engineer, is a fellow-servant of said engineer, and the latter cannot recover for injuries suffered in a collision due to a negligent mistake of the operator in transcribing the dispatch.—Rogers v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 160 Mich. 42.

§ 55k. ——Vice principals or agents of company and other employees.

¶ 698. Where, by direction of the company's division superintendent, an abandoned switch has been reopened and used, failure to notify the engineers of trains or to restore the switch lights must be regarded as the negligence of the company and not of the section-master, a fellow-servant of an injured engineer, and the company is liable.—Town v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 84 Mich. 214.

¶ 699. A railroad station agent selecting cars to be loaded, and who furnishes an open rack car for the transportation of refuse from a planing mill, is not the fellow-servant of a section man injured by the derailment of a hand car caused by a piece of wood which had fallen from the car, since the duty of selecting proper cars cannot be delegated.—McLean v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 137 Mich. 482.

¶ 700. A station agent was employed and paid by two railroads crossing each other. The agent was given authority to hire and discharge the tower men at the intersection, but had no power to prescribe rules governing them, these being promulgated by the companies. Plaintiff engineer was injured by the alleged negligence of the tower man in giving signals. Held, the station agent was not the master of the tower man or the vice principal of the defendant railroad, so as to render defendant liable.—Stever v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 160 Mich. 207.

¶ 701. An assistant roadmaster who in the absence of the conductor was in charge of a train from which rails were being unloaded was not a fellow-servant of a section man engaged in unloading such rails, but was a vice-principal.—LaBarre v. Grand Trunk W. Ry. Co., 133 Mich. 192.

§ 702. A section man specially directed to mount a stepladder on top of a box car and to cut an overhead trolley wire is not a fellow-servant of the division roadmaster who directs him to do it.—Walker v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 104 Mich. 606, per Montgomery, J., and McGrath, C. J.

¶ 703. The duty to furnish a safe place for its employees to work being one that a railroad company cannot delegate so as to relieve itself from responsibility, section men within the scope of whose duties it may have been to remove from the track ice which subsequently causes the derailing of a car and the consequent killing of a brakeman, are not fellow-servants of his with respect to the performance of such duties.—Balhoff v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 106 Mich. 606.

¶ 704. A train-dispatcher who has absolute control over a division of a railroad, so far as the running and operating of trains is concerned, is not a "fellow-servant" with other employees acting under his orders.—Hunn v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 78 Mich. 513.

¶ 705. A yardmaster, who has full charge of the yards of a railroad company and who hires and discharges men and assigns them to their work, is not their fellow-servant, but is the agent or vice-principal of the company, and notice to him of defects in appliances and of the incompetency of a fireman handling a switch-engine is notice to the company, and upon his promise to remedy those evils a switchman, complaining of them, has a right to rely for a reasonable time and to a reasonable extent, and if he continues in the service relying on such promise the rule that an employee accepts the risks of his employment when he continues in it knowing of defects does not apply, unless the company fails for an unreasonable time to make repairs, etc.—Lyttle v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 84 Mich. 289.

¶ 706. In an action by a switchman for injuries received because of an unblocked frog while uncoupling cars, it is no defense that defendant had employed men to see that the frogs in its yards are kept blocked, and that it furnished the necessary material; the statutory duty cannot be delegated to an employee so as to relieve the employer, and the negligence of the former in this regard is that of the latter.—Ashman v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 90 Mich. 567.

¶ 707. An assistant road-master controlling a gang of men with power of direction and discharge is a superior servant, and for his negligence the employer is liable.—Harrison v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 79 Mich. 409; Palmer v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 93 Mich. 363.

¶ 708. A servant, to whom the master has delegated the care and management of the entire business or of a distinct department thereof, so as to charge him with the performance of duties toward subordinates that the law imposes upon the master, stands in the latter's place, and the rule of respondeat superior applies to render the master liable for injury where this superior servant, abusing his authority, orders an inferior to perform work differing from that for which he was employed.—Harrison v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 79 Mich. 409.

§ 55l. ——Inspector and other employees.

¶ 709. A car inspector, whose duty it is to inspect cars and their apparatus, is not a brakeman's fellow-servant, and the company is liable for his negligence in permitting the putting on the car of a defective brake-chain if injury results to the brakeman.—Morton v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co., 81 Mich. 423.

¶ 710. A brakeman on a freight train, and a car inspector charged by the common employer with the duty of inspecting cars received from other companies for transportation, and of seeing that they are properly loaded and in good condition, are fellow-servants.—Dewey v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 97 Mich. 329.

¶ 711. A switchman in the employ of a board composed of representatives of three railroad companies, to whose general control of a union depot, tracks, and yard, the individual companies are subject, is not a fellow-servant of a car inspector employed by one of the companies, even when the switchman is engaged in handling the business of that particular road, and a car inspector so employed does not assume the risk of injury from the negligence of such switchman, so as to preclude a recovery for his death in an action against the roads in their associate capacity.—Kastl v. Wabash R. Co., 114 Mich. 53.

¶ 712. Where a railroad employed a competent inspector to inspect cars coming in from other roads, and the inspector made a faulty inspection of the car in question, or none at all, thus failing to detect a defective stake or stakes, which latter fell upon and killed a switchman at work in the yard, there was no liability, as the inspector and the switchman were fellow-servants.—Lellis v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 124 Mich. 37.

¶ 713. Car inspectors are not such fellow-servants of a freight conductor as to relieve the railroad company from liability for injury to the conductor resulting from their negligence.—McDonald v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 132 Mich. 372.

¶ 714. Where a railroad company makes no provision for inspection of its engines except by the engineers in charge, who are expected at all practicable times to perform that duty and report defects, they must be held to be the representatives of the company.—McDonald v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 108 Mich. 7.

¶ 715. The inspector of a roadbed is not the fellow-servant of an engineer in regard to a failure to inspect.—Hamilton v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 135 Mich. 95.

§ 55m. ——Foremen and other employees.

¶ 716. The foreman of a gang of car-repairers and the engineer of a switch-engine are fellow-servants of one of the repairers, who, if he is injured through their negligence, cannot recover against the employing railroad company.—Peterson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 67 Mich. 102.

¶ 717. Whether a section foreman can be considered a fellow-servant of the men working under him so as to relieve the common employer from liability for his negligence, quære.—Hammond v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 83 Mich. 334.

¶ 718. Where a gang of section-men is propelling a hand-car along the track, the foreman's failure to send a look-out ahead near a curve to give warning of an expected train must be regarded as shared in by the section-men who voluntarily and without express orders remain on the car; and no recovery can be had for the death of one of the men from a collision.—Hammond v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 83 Mich. 334.

¶ 719. A foreman who has charge of a gravel-train, with power to hire and discharge all men working thereon, and to whom alone they can make complaint, is not a fellow-servant of said employees.—Erickson v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co., 93 Mich. 414.

¶ 720. Where, in an action against a railroad company by an employee who was one of a gang of men at work for the company under a foreman's charge, unloading and levelling dirt hauled upon its premises, and who was injured by the backing of an engine against the loaded cars from which it had been detached, the sole act of negligence alleged as ground for recovery was that the foreman failed to give notice to the men under his charge that the train was about to move, held, as he and plaintiff were fellow-servants there could be no recovery.—Schroeder v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 108 Mich. 213.

¶ 721. A section man engaged with other members of the section gang in moving a loaded car by shoving against it an empty car, was ordered by the section boss to climb upon the loaded car and set the brake, and while climbing a ladder on the loaded car to execute the order was injured by the empty car's being pushed against him. Held, that the negligence, if any, was that of the section boss or of the men under his control, all of whom were fellow-servants of the injured employee, so that he could not recover against the employer.—Gavigan v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 110 Mich. 71.

¶ 722. A roadmaster, being prevented by illness from accompanying a work train sent out to distribute railroad ties along the right of way, placed a section foreman in charge of the train, with instructions as to the loading, removing, and handling of the ties. No general power was conferred upon the foreman to make up and send out trains, to determine when and where they should go, to employ and discharge workmen, or to represent the roadmaster other than upon the particular occasion, and in accordance with his instructions. Held, that the foreman did not become a vice-principal of the company, so as to render it liable for injuries to one of the workmen resulting from the negligence of the foreman while in charge of the train.—Morch v. Toledo, S. & M. R. Co., 113 Mich. 154.

¶ 723. While the foreman of a gang of men employed in putting in a bridge may be their fellow-servant with respect to the manner of use of materials and appliances furnished by the master, or with respect to the selection of the same from among those near at hand, he represents the master when he undertakes the duty of selecting suitable materials from a supply in a warehouse eighty miles distant, and for a negligent selection, resulting in injury to an employee, the master is liable.—Thomas v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 114 Mich. 59.

¶ 724. The negligence of a conductor and brakemen in placing timbers on a flat car without complying with the rules requiring the proper securing of the timbers, and the failure of the station agent to inspect the loading, whereby the foreman of a gang of section hands at work surfacing the track was injured by a projecting timber, was the act of fellow-servants for which the railroad company, which provided safe appliances and a safe place to work, is not liable.—Miller v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 123 Mich. 374.

¶ 725. The foreman of the car department of a railroad supervising men who do repair work is the fellow-servant of one working in the woodworking department who in the line of his duties has been called out to assist in the repair of a loaded freight car.—McClure v. Detroit Southern R. Co., 146 Mich. 457.

¶ 726. Where a car repairer, before going in between two cars, was assured by the car foreman that he would be protected, and the duties of such car foreman were delegable and of a limited character, and he sometimes worked with the men, the failure of such foreman to protect plaintiff is the negligence of a fellow-servant.—Garlinghouse v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 174 Mich. 73.

¶ 727. A car repairer and a roundhouse foreman are fellow-servants.—Revolinski v. Manistee & N. E. R. Co., 186 Mich. 501.

¶ 728. Defendant railroad's foreman in charge of constructing a branch line took plaintiff and other laborers so employed and set them to work clearing up a wreck. Plaintiff was directed by the said foreman to turn the cog wheel of a derrick by taking hold of its spokes, and while so engaged was injured. Held, the foreman was a fellow-servant and not a vice principal of the plaintiff.—Peters v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 165 Mich. 217.

¶ 729. A car repairer and a roundhouse foreman are fellow-servants.—Revolinski v. Manistee & N. E. R. Co., 186 Mich. 501.

§ 55n. ——Conductors and other employees.

¶ 730. A conductor of a freight train, under whose direction a brakeman is assisting in the unloading of freight, is the fellow-servant of the brakeman.—LaPierre v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 99 Mich. 212.

¶ 731. Conductor and brakemen are fellow-servants whose acts are not independent in such a sense as to separate them from each other in the line of dangers.—Greenwald v. Marquette, H. & O. R. Co., 49 Mich. 197.

¶ 732. If a conductor of a freight train be killed through the negligence of the engineer of another train whereby a collision has been occasioned, there can be no recovery against their employer, the conductor and the engineer being fellow-servants.—Enright v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co., 93 Mich. 409.

¶ 733. Where a fireman on a passenger train while in the cab of his engine and passing a freight train on a side track was struck and injured by the projecting limb of a tree on a flat car loaded with trees, he cannot recover, the negligence, if any, being the failure of the conductor of the freight train—a fellow-servant—to see, under a rule known to the plaintiff, that the flat car was properly loaded before receiving it into his train.—Jarman v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 98 Mich. 135.

¶ 734. The failure of the brakeman or conductor of a passenger train equipped with air brakes, in the use of which they have been properly instructed, to pull the automatic cord by which the brakes are operated in response to the engineer's signal, is, as to the engineer, the negligence of a fellow-servant, for which the railroad company is not liable.—Whalen v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 114 Mich. 512.

¶ 735. A railroad company was not liable, in an action for injuries to a freight conductor who was struck by a movable platform of a milkhouse as he was climbing the ladder on a car of his moving train, where, it appears that the station agent, whose duty it was to raise and lower such platform as occasion required, had lowered the same just before the accident, and where no evidence of defect on such platform was given; since in the discharge of such duty, the station agent, as fellow-servant of the plaintiff was responsible.—Henry v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 140 Mich. 446.

¶ 736. Plaintiff was a street car conductor, and was on the running board of the car, collecting fares, while it was in motion. A section man had left the handles of a wheelbarrow loaded with bricks projecting near the track. Plaintiff in passing along got entangled therewith and was injured. Held, the case presented was not one where the defendant had failed to provide a safe place to work, but plaintiff was injured by the negligent act of a fellow-servant, and could not recover.—Wickham v. Detroit United Ry., 160 Mich. 277.

§ 55o. ——Brakemen or switchmen and other employees.

¶ 737. A boy about 17 years old was employed as brakeman by the engineer of an ore train. The engineer had power to employ and discharge brakemen, and the boy was capable and experienced in the business. The engineer directed the fireman to back the locomotive upon a side track to the train, and told the brakeman to attend a switch. He himself went to attend another switch further on. While this was being done the bell and whistle of a train on the main track near by were both sounding. The first switch was passed, and the engineer was about throwing the second when he heard an outcry and saw the brakeman under the locomotive. The brakeman died in a few minutes from his injuries, and his administrator sued the railroad company for the injury. It was proved that the brakeman knew the train was about moving back, and that there was room enough for him to perform his duties. Held, that he needed no further warning of his danger, and that the accident was due to his own negligence; also, that if the failure to sound the bell and whistle of the locomotive was negligence, it was the fault of the fireman, who was a fellow-servant of the brakeman, and for whose negligence towards a fellow-servant the company would not be liable.—Greenwald v. Marquette, H. & O. R. Co., 49 Mich. 197.

¶ 738. A brakeman cannot hold the company which employs him responsible for the failure of fellow-servants to take peculiar precautions.—Day v. Toledo, C. S. & D. R. Co., 42 Mich. 523.

¶ 739. If, owing to the engineer's negligence, the step of an engine becomes loose, whereby a brakeman attempting to board the engine is injured, such negligence is that of a fellow-servant, and the company is not liable.—Miller v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 90 Mich. 230.

¶ 740. A brakeman who in attempting to board a moving engine is injured in consequence of the step's being loose and turning may not recover in an action for negligence against the company, if he offers no evidence that the engineer whose duty it was to see to the step was incompetent or did not have the proper tools to repair the step, and where there is produced nothing to show how long the step was loose or whether the company knew of its insecurity.—Miller v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 90 Mich. 230.

¶ 741. A conductor of a freight train desired to leave two box cars on a siding, and directed a brakeman to get upon an empty flat car next to the tender, and assist in making a running switch. The brakeman mounted the flat car, and kneeled down at the rear end. The conductor climbed upon the first box car, which was attached to the flat car, and took his station at the rear, to apply the brake, in which position he was out of sight of the brakeman. The brakeman pulled the pin at the proper time, and just as he was reaching over the end of the flat car to lay it on the bumper of the detached box car, the engine suddenly started ahead, and he was thrown onto the track, and his leg so injured as to render amputation necessary. Neither the conductor nor the brakeman gave the engineer any signal to go ahead when the pin was drawn. Held, that the engineer should not have started up his engine until notified; that the sudden starting of the engine and flat car was the proximate cause of the accident, for which the engineer alone was responsible; and, being a fellow-servant of the brakeman, the railroad company was not liable for the consequent injury to the brakeman.—Stanley v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 101 Mich. 202.

¶ 742. It is no defense to a brakeman's action against a railroad company for injuries sustained because of an abrupt depression in one of the rails of its track, that the immediate cause of the accident was the negligence of the section men who were charged with the duty of keeping the track in repair; they not being the brakeman's fellow-servants in relation to that duty.—Anderson v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 107 Mich. 591.

¶ 743. Where a brakeman was injured in consequence of his stumbling against a pile of ashes and cinders dumped upon a track by a passing engine, although the proper dumping place was at the turn-table, it was held, that the fireman who did the dumping, and the section men whose duty it was to remove the ashes and cinders, were with the brakeman fellow-servants for whose negligence the company was not liable unless it had actual notice of the obstruction, or unless the same had existed so long that notice would be implied.—Loranger v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 104 Mich. 80.

¶ 744. A switchman and a crossing watchman are fellow-servants, and the latter cannot recover from the railroad company for injuries sustained by reason of the negligence of the former.—Dixon v. Grand Trunk Western Ry. Co., 155 Mich. 169.

¶ 745. Plaintiff employed in the operation of making up trains on defendant's tracks was injured by the fact that after he had been caught between a car and engine another engine was backed down upon the car. Such engine was backed in through the failure of a servant of defendant who had charge of the general operation of trains in and about the station, to give an order preventing it. Held, that plaintiff and such other employee were fellow-servants and that plaintiff was not entitled to recover.—McCauley v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 167 Mich. 230.

¶ 746. The engineer of a switch engine owned by one having private switch tracks to a stone crushing plant, and another workman whose duty it is to pinch down empty cars to the crusher after they are switched to a certain point by the engineer, are fellow-servants.—Salo v. Martin, 187 Mich. 617.

§ 55p. Mine employees.

Statutory provisions regulating employment of mine workers, see ante § 36.
Assumption of miner's risks, see post § 56n.

¶ 747. A common workman employed about a mine, but not himself a miner, is not a fellow-employee of the miners in any such sense that he cannot recover for an injury caused him by the mining operations.—James v. Emmet Min. Co., 55 Mich. 335.

¶ 748. There can be no recovery against a mine owner for the death of a pumpman in the mine based upon the negligence of a brakeman having control of the machinery inasmuch as the pumpman and brakeman must be considered fellow-servants.—Williams v. Verona Min. Co., 149 Mich. 45.

¶ 749. The engineer of a mining hoist charged with the duty of keeping the friction lever in place, to prevent the skip from falling, is not a fellow-servant of one employed to load the skip.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 750. An engineer at a mine whose duty it was to promptly operate a hoisting apparatus on given signals, in order that the miners might be removed to a safe place during blasting held a fellow-servant of the miners.—Panela v. Castile Min. Co., 177 Mich. 669.

¶ 751. A miner employed at the bottom of a shaft, and timbermen working above him engaged in timbering the shaft, held to be fellow-servants.—Kaaro v. Ahmeek Mining Co., 178 Mich. 661.

¶ 752. Miners, trammers and timbermen engaged in a common undertaking of driving a drift and digging out ore and rock in a mine, are fellow-servants.—Koskell v. Newport Min. Co., 182 Mich. 586.

¶ 753. The members of a timber crew engaged in making a mine safe for miners to work in are fellow-servants.—Juntunen v. Quincy Min. Co., 184 Mich. 341.

¶ 754. The failure of a block-holer to give warning to a trammer before casting a rock down the stope of a mine, held to be the negligence of a fellow-servant.—Mesich v. Tamarack Min. Co., 184 Mich. 363.

¶ 755. Where a trammer on observing the unsafe position of a large loose rock in a stope was assured by the miners of its safety, and it soon after fell and killed the former, the negligence, if any, of the miners was that of the fellow-servants of the deceased.—Lesh v. Tamarack Min. Co., 186 Mich. 399.

¶ 757. Where a miner while going to his work by the usual route through a cross-cut in a mine was injured by tram cars which were being run without a headlight by a conductor who was charged with the duty of placing a miner's lamp on the forward car, the lamp provided having been broken before the cars were started, held that the accident was due to the negligence of a fellow-servant of the injured employee.—Lahti v. Tamarack Min. Co., 186 Mich. 18. (Bird, Moore and Kuhn, JJ., dissenting); Arfman v. Tamarack Min. Co., 187 Mich. 344.

¶ 758. The members of a day shift employed in timbering a mine are fellow-servants of members of a night shift engaged on the same work, and employed by the same master.—Kangas v. Cleveland Cliffs Iron Co., 188 Mich. 255.

¶ 759. A miner, who with another workman, is engaged in timbering up a drift so that it may be used as a passageway, and tests overhanging rock preliminary to timbering is the fellow-servant of the other workman.—Aho v. Cleveland Cliffs Iron Co., 188 Mich. 218.

¶ 760. An employer who has provided a safe place, proper appliances and competent employees fully instructed as to their duties, and who has established proper rules and regulations for the safe conduct of his business, is not liable for the negligence of an employee in failing to notify a fellow-servant of a transitory or temporary danger caused by his act which for the moment renders the environment unsafe.—Mesich v. Tamarack Min. Co., 184 Mich. 363.

¶ 761. A mining captain who has the entire management of the mine without direction or interference by the owner occupies the owner's place and is not a mere fellow-servant of a laborer employed in the mine, even though he was not appointed directly by the owner, but only by the owner's agent. And the owner is liable for his negligence.—Ryan v. Bagaley, 50 Mich. 179.

§ 55q. ——Shift or timber boss and other employees.

¶ 762. A timber boss is a fellow-servant of employees working in the shaft of a mine.—Erickson v. Victoria Copper Min. Co., 130 Mich. 476.

¶ 763. No recovery can be had for injury to an employee in a mine caused by the falling of a plank which was being lowered in the shaft by means of a rope fastened with a halfhitch around each end of the plank, the evidence being conflicting whether fastening by means of halfhitches or by means of holes bored in the plank was the customary way for lowering planks, but it appearing that augers were furnished for boring the holes and if there was negligence it was that of the timber boss, who was a fellow-servant, in failing to use the augers.—Erickson v. Victoria Copper Min. Co., 130 Mich. 476.

¶ 764. In the case of injury to a mine trammer injured by a top fall while he was loading ore upon cars and removing it as fast as it was brought to the floor by the miners, the fall being because timbers were not yet set or because ore on top of timbering had been loosened in progress of mining, it was held that, if there was any negligence, it was that of the miners or of the shift boss, who were fellow-servants of plaintiff, and whose duty it was to see to timbering.—Petaja v. Aurora Iron Min. Co., 106 Mich. 463.

¶ 765. A shift boss in a mine who fails to notify the succeeding mining crew of dangerous conditions is not a fellow-servant of the miners.—Panela v. Castile Min. Co., 177 Mich. 669.

¶ 766. The custom or rule that a mine timber boss must first go into the place where a blast is fired, inspect conditions, and notify the other timbermen does not constitute him a vice principal.—Vrelenich v. Calumet & Hecla Mining Co., 188 Mich. 407.

¶ 767. Defendant mining company directed plaintiff trammer where to work, and instructed him that he was neither employed nor paid to pinch down rock from the overhanging walls, and that he must spend no time in making the place safe in that regard; that such work should be attended to by the captain, shift boss and miners, and the place would be kept safe for him; and that he must abide by their judgment whether or not the place was safe. Held, upon injury to the plaintiff from falling rock, defendant could not urge that the negligence was that of the captain, shift boss and miners, and not its own.—Scendar v. Winona Copper Co., 169 Mich. 665.

F. RISKS ASSUMED BY SERVANT.

§ 56. In general; nature and basis of doctrine.

Risks of fellow-servants' acts or negligence, see post § 56 l.
Risks assumed by miners, see post § 56n.
Risks assumed by factory, shop, and mill employees, see post § 56o.
Risks assumed by linemen, see post § 56p.
Risks assumed by railroad employees, see post § 57.
Risks assumed under Federal Employers' Liability Act, see post § 58.

Instructions as to assumption of risk, see post § 71f.
Under Workmen's Compensation Act, see Workmen's Compensation Act.

¶ 768. The principle of assumed risks rests upon the ground that it is an implied contract that the employee shall assume all obvious dangers.—Bradburn v. Wabash R. Co., 134 Mich. 575.

¶ 769. The principle of assumed risk rests upon the ground that it is an implied contract between the employer and the employee that the employee shall assume the risk of all dangers obviously incident to his employment.—Brouseau v. Kellogg Switchboard & Supply Co., 158 Mich. 312.

¶ 770. The principle of assumed risk is applicable in cases in which the employer is negligent and the employee free from negligence. It is not restricted to cases where the master was free from negligence or the servant was contributively negligent.—Bradburn v. Wabash R. Co., 134 Mich. 575.

¶ 771. Assumptions of risk arise from the contract of employment, the servant assuming the risk of all obvious dangers incident to the service which were known or should have been known to him.—Molyneaux v. Bradley, Miller & Co., 167 Mich. 278.

¶ 772. In an action against a power company for the wrongful death of a telephone lineman caused by coming in contact with high tension wires of the defendant situated in close proximity to telephone wires which decedent was required to repair, the doctrine of assumed risk is inapplicable, there being no contract relation between the parties.—Teachout v. Grand Rapids, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 179 Mich. 388.

¶ 773. Extraordinary risks may be assumed by a servant under an express agreement, where such an agreement is permissible, and the agreement may be inferred from circumstances.—Delbusso v. American Cement Plaster Co., 165 Mich. 318.

§ 56a. Risks incident to the employment.

Scope of employment, see ante § 34.
Jury questions as to scope of employment, see post § 67a.

¶ 774. An employee assumes the risks usually incident to the employment.—Fort Wayne, J. & S. R. Co. v. Gildersleeve, 33 Mich. 133; Quincy Min. Co. v. Kitts, 42 Mich. 34; Day v. Toledo, C. S. & D. R. Co., 42 Mich. 523; Piquegno v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 52 Mich. 40; Richards v. Rough, 53 Mich. 212; Gardner v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 58 Mich. 584; Hewitt v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 67 Mich. 61; Illick v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 67 Mich. 632; Tuttle v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 122 U. S. 189, 30 L. ed. 1114, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1166.

¶ 775. The only risks which a servant assumes are those which properly belong to his employment.—Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Bayfield, 37 Mich. 205.

¶ 776. An employee assumes the risks of his employment when the machinery used is not defective and the usual means are adopted to guard against accident.—Swoboda v. Ward, 40 Mich. 420.

¶ 777. An employee must be deemed to have assumed the risks of accidental injuries the results of unexpected causes, where such causes arise in the course of such servant's employment.—Rodman v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 55 Mich. 57.

¶ 778. The servant assumes only such risks as are incident to his employment.—Snow v. Escanaba Power Co., 162 Mich. 579.

¶ 779. Where a servant engaged in wheeling sand from a sand pile is injured by the falling of a frozen crust which had been undermined by him, there is no negligence in not lighting up the entire place where the work continues in shifts during the entire day and night, the necessity of light at any particular place being an incident to the business.—Livingstone v. Saginaw Plate Glass Co., 146 Mich. 236.

§ 56b. Known, obvious or apparent dangers.

Duty to make safe as against known obvious or apparent dangers, see also ante § 48b
Duty to warn or instruct where the danger known or obvious, see ante § 54c.
Contributory negligence in failing to avoid known or obvious risks, see post § 59e.
Evidence as to servant's knowledge of dangers, see post § 64i.
Jury questions as to knowledge of dangers see post § 67q.

¶ 780. There is no breach of duty in employing a servant subject to the ordinary risks of the employment if the servant himself is aware of the risks and consents to encounter them.—McGinnis v. Canada Southern Bridge Co., 49 Mich. 466.

¶ 781. An employer is not liable in damages for injuries received by employees who have voluntarily assumed the risks of the employment with full knowledge of the methods employed.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Smithson, 45 Mich. 212.

¶ 782. An employee assumes the risks that ordinary observation makes apparent.—Kent v. Detroit Copper & Brass Rolling Mills, 96 Mich. 277; Illick v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 67 Mich. 632; Gillette v. Grand Trunk Western Ry. Co., 192 Mich. 113.

¶ 783. Where the risks of an employment are not concealed, but are open and visible, an employee is deemed to accept the employment and to continue in it with reference thereto, and the master is not liable for injury.—Fisher v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 7 Mich. 546.

¶ 784. Where a danger incident to a given employment is apparent, the employee assumes the risk.—Manning v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 105 Mich. 260.

¶ 785. An employee, as a matter of law, assumes the risk of all such dangers incident to his employment, as he knows to exist or should have acquainted himself with.—Harrison v. Detroit, Y., A. A. & J. Ry. Co., 137 Mich. 78.

¶ 786. The doctrine that the employee assumes the risk of all dangers obviously incident to his employment, is limited in its application to dangers which the employee either actually knows or should know.—McDonald v. Champion Iron & Steel Co., 140

Mich. 401; De Kallands v. Washtenaw Home Tel. Co., 153 Mich. 25.

¶ 787. Where a machine is not in proper condition, a person operating it assumes only such risks as the jury finds that he knew of, or ought to have known of, and appreciated.—Clemens v. Gem Fibre Package Co., 153 Mich. 495.

¶ 788. An employee assumes, as a matter of contract, only such risks as are known, or might reasonably be known, to him.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 789. An employee assumes the risk of obvious dangers incident to his employment.—Neifert v. Metler, 165 Mich. 354.

¶ 790. The doctrine of the assumption of obvious risks applies as well to those which arise or become known to the employee during the employment as to those in contemplation at the original hiring.—De Kallands v. Washtenaw Home Tel. Co., 153 Mich. 25.

¶ 791. The risks assumed by an employee on entering an employment are those of which he has actual knowledge or of which he ought to have known.—Hazzard v. Consolidated Coal Co., 183 Mich. 363.

¶ 792. An employee assumes all known risks incidental to his place of employment, including those subsequently arising and becoming known to him during his service.—Cole v. Mamer Brick Co., 183 Mich. 290.

¶ 793. The master has a right to expect that a servant will be on the alert to inform himself of existing conditions, and he cannot attack the master from the shelter of unjustifiable ignorance, actual ignorance being insufficient to charge an employer.—Gaines v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 193 Mich. 398.

¶ 794. Whether a servant assumes the risks incidental to his place of employment, and those arising from defective appliances, depends upon the capacity and understanding of the servant, the nature of the defects, the obviousness of the same, and consequent danger.—Delbusso v. American Cement Plaster Co., 165 Mich. 318.

¶ 795. An employee injured by a brick's falling upon him from the top of a partly destroyed chimney near which he was at work cannot recover damages against his employer where no loose bricks at the top of it were visible or known to any one and the danger was as apparent to him as to any one.—Pilucki v. Detroit Steel & Spring Works, 117 Mich. 111.

¶ 796. A servant knowing the hazards of the employment as the business is conducted by the master, assumes the risk of injury due to such hazard, and the same is true where such dangers are obvious.—Wilson v. Escanaba Woodenware Co., 152 Mich. 540.

¶ 797. It is not merely the physical surroundings of the servant that must be obvious to him in order that he may be held to have assumed the risks arising therefrom, but it must be obvious to him, or at least to an ordinarily prudent servant, under the circumstances, that there is danger in such a situation.—De Kallands v. Washtenaw Home Tel. Co., 153 Mich. 25.

¶ 798. It is a master's duty to instruct a servant as to risks which he will not discover by the exercise of ordinary care, but when the servant is a mature man he assumes such risks as arise from obvious dangers.—Newberry v. Boyne City Tanning Co., 176 Mich. 437.

¶ 799. An experienced employee, who had been engaged for a year prior to an accident caused by a gang-plank's slipping out of the car, into which one end had been placed while unloading freight upon the adjoining platform, and who had been during that time familiar with the plank and the manner of its use, will be held to have voluntarily assumed the attendant risk.—LaPierre v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 99 Mich. 212.

¶ 800. An experienced employee familiar with the use of a gang-plank in unloading freight cannot be heard to complain of an injury, incurred while using the plank in the ordinary manner, on the ground that it was not furnished with hooks, spikes, or cleats to prevent its slipping, it appearing that he had used the plank for a year prior to the accident without protest or objection, or even a suggestion that it was unsafe, or a request that the hooks, spikes, or cleats be supplied.—LaPierre v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 99 Mich. 212.

¶ 801. A servant proceeding down a dark stairway on a ship, knowing of the darkness, and that there was no means of lighting it, assumes the ordinary risks of injury by reason of the lack of light.—Mero v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 180 Mich. 1.

¶ 802. Plaintiff was a foreman in charge of defendant railway's coal dock. Defendant's engines were coaled at the dock by means of large buckets, which were hoisted full of coal from the dock to the tenders by power supplied by the engines, and were then unloaded by opening a door in the bottom of the buckets. This door was held closed by a catch or lip, which lip was supported by a spring and a wedge. Plaintiff at the time of the accident was steadying with his hand a bucket of coal as it was being hoisted upon the tender. As the bucket struck the tender on the side, the wedge came out, and the door flew open and caught plaintiff's hand. Plaintiff testified that he knew the doors of the buckets would at times do this when subjected to a sudden jar. Held, he assumed the risk and could not recover.—Lukovski v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 164 Mich. 361.

¶ 803. A servant is held to assume the ordinary risks of the business upon which he enters, so far as those risks at the time of his so entering are known to him, or should be readily discernible by a person of his age and capacity, in the exercise of ordinary care, e. g., that a box in the space between tan-vats might trip his feet when working.—Balle v. Detroit Leather Co., 73 Mich. 158.

¶ 804. An employee aged 24 years, experienced in moving and handling heavy iron beams, who was injured by being struck in some unexplained way by an iron beam which he, with others, was unloading from a wagon, and who must have known as much about the danger involved as any one, cannot recover against the employer.—Nephew v. Whitehead, 123 Mich. 255.

¶ 805. A servant who is familiar with the conditions cannot recover for injuries sustained by him while wheeling a heavily loaded truck on narrow boards laid by himself.—Shanke v. United States Heater Co., 125 Mich. 346.

¶ 806. A servant engaged in wheeling a heavily loaded truck on boards laid by himself on soft earth assumes the risk of injury sustained through the sinking of the boards.—Shanke v. United States Heater Co., 125 Mich. 346.

¶ 807. A capable dredge engineer, part of whose duty was to assist in making repairs, and who the year before the accident had assisted in lowering a similar casting into a similar opening, the process not being a complicated one, must be said to have assumed the risk of injury and no recovery can be had for his death incurred where a heavy casting had slipped while being lowered into the hold of a dredge where repairs were being made.—Schneider v. Wolverine Portland Cement Co., 146 Mich. 87.

¶ 808. A servant employed at common labor cannot recover from his master for injuries received from handling a heavy plate, where the danger was obvious, and the master had no knowledge of such danger which such servant did not possess, and the question of safe place to work does not apply.—White v. Owosso Sugar Co., 149 Mich. 473.

¶ 809. A servant employed on a high structure in iron working, including the turning and making of threads on pipes, assumes the risk from falling where the place where he is working requires care to prevent falling.—Sheon v. Kerr-Murray Mfg. Co., 146 Mich. 99.

¶ 810. In an action for injuries sustained by an employee of defendant it was shown the plaintiff was injured by the fall of a log from a car which his fellow-employees were unloading, that at the time of the accident and for a few hours prior thereto plaintiff was employed in driving a team engaged in moving the car, but for a considerable time previous had been engaged in piling the logs after they had been unloaded from the car and was familiar with the method of unloading. Held the risk was assumed.—Hilgbrandt v. Oval Wood Dish Co., 180 Mich. 43.

¶ 811. The risk of injury from the wheel of a wagon running off as the result of the nut or burr coming off the axle is assumed by a driver whose duty it was to inspect his wagon before taking it out, since the defect was one which a casual inspection would have disclosed.—Riffel v. Union Truck Co., Ltd., 180 Mich. 673.

¶ 812. An experienced teamster who uses, under protest, an unsuitable chain furnished him by his employer for binding a load of lumber, assumes the risk of injury therefrom.—Kelley v. Davison, 185 Mich. 123.

¶ 813. An employee of a coal company assumes the risk of injury from being caught between the timbers of a coal tipple and the side of an unusually wide car, as he removed a block from beneath the wheels thereof so as to permit it to run down an incline, where he was aware of the danger and had authority to reject the car because of its width.—Lewis v. Wolverine Coal Co., 186 Mich. 564.

¶ 814. In an action for personal injuries sustained by a woodsman as the result of a tree falling upon him, which was felled by workmen working in another gang near him, evidence held to show that the plaintiff was as well aware of the peculiar danger attendant upon his work as was his master, that his place to work was safe unless by his own acts or the acts of his fellow-servants it was made unsafe, and that therefore he assumed the risk.—Stone v. Bennett, 194 Mich. 441.

Contributory negligence where danger not known or understood, see post § 59j.

Evidence as to experience of servant, see post § 641.

¶ 815. If the peculiar risk commanded by the master is not obvious, the servant has the right to assume that he is not being put in peril, and is not bound to investigate into the risk before obeying his orders.—Harrison v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 79 Mich. 409.

¶ 816. The doctrine that a servant assumes all the dangers that are apparent to him when he enters the employment has no application to a case where the danger is questionable or debatable and where it is apparent only to those possessing peculiar skill and knowledge in such matters.—Eddy v. Aurora Iron Mining Co., 81 Mich. 548.

¶ 817. An employee assumes the risk of injury from a danger obviously incident to the discharge of his duties though he is not informed of and does not know of the danger.—Bauer v. American Car & Foundry Co., 132 Mich. 537.

¶ 818. An employee cannot be held to have assumed the risk of injury from a defect which he did not know of, and which it cannot be said as a matter of law that he had occasion to know of.—Bernard v. Pittsburg Coal Co., 137 Mich. 279.

¶ 819. In the application of the doctrine of assumed risk, actual ignorance of the employee of existing conditions will not alone suffice to charge the master; the ignorance must also be excusable.—De Kallands v. Washtenaw Home Tel. Co., 153 Mich. 25.

¶ 820. The risks which the servant assumes are only such as are directly connected with his work, and not unforeseen and unexpected dangers arising at a distance from his work, because of defendant's negligence, and as to which his surroundings would not in themselves warn him.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 821. An employee assumes the ordinary dangers of his employment, and the risk of defective machinery and methods known to him or so obvious that he should have known them, but it is not the law that the employee must make a minute investigation of machines and methods to ascertain such risks and defects, although he does owe caution and care in these respects.—Delbusso v. American Cement Plaster Co., 165 Mich. 318.

¶ 822. The assumption of risk rule does not apply to new dangers created by an employer without notice to his employees, unless the danger is such that it is negligence for the employees not to observe it.—Webb v. Buick Motor Co., 182 Mich. 551.

¶ 823. An employee of another department does not assume the risk of an explosion being caused through a steam-fitter and plumber allowing water to come in contact with calcium carbide, where it is not shown that he has knowledge of what such steam-fitter is doing, or that he had any warning of the danger.—Charron v. Union Carbide Co., 151 Mich. 687.

¶ 824. An employee of a railroad riding on the pilot of a locomotive cannot be said to assume the risk where the defect in the pilot (hanging too low) was unknown to him. It is going too far to say that he was bound to discover it when he had never seen the engine before.—Barschow v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 147 Mich. 226.

¶ 825. Plaintiff was injured by defendant's mangle upon her first attempt to use it, owing to the defective condition of a guard. Plaintiff secured no instructions from defendant. She had previously used a different kind of mangle in another laundry. Held, the risk was not an obvious one and plaintiff did not assume it.—Garnsley v. Boyce, 158 Mich. 8.

¶ 826. Plaintiff was employed by defendant to draw off the molten product from the melting pot in the process of manufacturing porcelain. A tank was used to receive the molten mass, and it was necessary to fill it with the proper amount of water before drawing off the mass. Plaintiff filled the tank about one-third full of water, and upon the contact of the molten mass with the water an explosion occurred injuring plaintiff. Held, the possibility of such an explosion was not within ordinary knowledge, and plaintiff, not having been instructed by the master, did not assume the risk.—Adams v. Grand Rapids Refrigerator Co., 160 Mich. 590.

§ 56d. Age, experience or intelligence of servant as factor.

Statutory provisions regulating employment of children, see ante § 35.

Duty to warn immature or inexperienced servant, see ante § 54d.

Infants employed in violation of statute as fellow-servants, see ante § 55e.

¶ 827. A master is liable for injuries to his servant resulting from the master's negligence in exposing the servant to risks which the latter is incapable of appreciating.—Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Bayfield, 37 Mich. 205.

¶ 828. A youth of inferior mental and physical power, employed as common laborer on the construction of defendant's road, and who had no experience as a brakeman, was ordered by the superintendent of the work to perform services as a brakeman, and in going to do so was run over and killed. Held, that the company was liable.—Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Bayfield, 37 Mich. 205.

¶ 829. The infancy of an employee does not of itself give him a cause of action against his employer for setting him at dangerous work, if it appears that he was of average intelligence, that his duties were explained to him when he entered upon the employment, and that he had in mind its dangers and the purpose to avoid them.—McGinnis v. Canada Southern Bridge Co., 49 Mich. 466.

¶ 830. A youth of nineteen employed for three years in a furniture factory where many different kinds of machinery were used was told by the foreman that unless he wished to run a certain split-saw three or four days he would have to lay off. He chose to run the saw, and on the fourth day lost his little finger by reason of the flying up of the piece of wood he was cutting. He had already complained that the work was too hard for him, and he had had no previous experience with it. The casualty was of a kind that had never happened before in the experience of the foreman, and consequently could not be foreseen. Held, that it was purely an accident for which he could not recover.—Prentiss v. Kent Furniture Mfg. Co., 63 Mich. 478.

¶ 831. In determining whether or not an infant, injured in an iron mill, assumed the risk of the dangers of his employment, the age and experience of such employee and the necessity for instructions are to be considered.—McDonald v. Champion Iron & Steel Co., 140 Mich. 401.

¶ 832. An intelligent boy 15 years old, who was injured by coming in contact with a small saw in a factory, assumed the risk of his employment, where he had been employed four months in the room where the saw was and had a space four feet wide within which to carry boards fifteen inches wide, and after nearly completing the day's work in safety, stumbled against a rise in the floor of which he was aware and thereby caught his arm in the saw which was without any guard or hood, and where he fully comprehended the situation, the danger and the necessity of keeping away from the saw, and where the fall by which his arm came in contact with the saw was either the result of his own want of care or else was purely accidental.—Journeaux v. E. H. Stafford Co., 122 Mich. 396.

¶ 833. In an action by a boy of sixteen years for personal injuries resulting from the operation of a polishing machine in a tannery, it appeared that plaintiff had been instructed generally as to the operation of the machines, but the one on which he worked jerked more than the ordinary machine, and got out of order more frequently. Although this special defect was known to plaintiff, he had received no warning concerning the danger. Held, that negligence the risk of which plaintiff did not assume was inferable from the circumstances.—Sabin v. Northwestern Leather Co., 157 Mich. 579.

¶ 834. The jury, in deciding the question of the servant's assumption of risks incident to the employment, should consider all the evidence, his age, experience and means of observation.—Cousineau v. Embury, 171 Mich. 23.

¶ 835. Where a plaintiff employed by defendant as a common laborer to shovel coal and handle lumber about defendant's mill is called by defendant's foreman from his usual work to operate temporarily a molding machine; is given no instructions or warning; and is injured by revolving knives invisible to him, by placing his hand on the bed plate of said machine, while standing in the rear of the same in an attempt to discover why said machine failed to work properly, he cannot be held as a matter of law to have assumed the risk, the jury having visited the premises and had an opportunity of seeing the machine in question in operation.—Molyneaux v. Bradley, Miller & Co., 167 Mich. 278.

¶ 836. A girl of seventeen who had been employed in a laundry upon the machine in question for two weeks, and upon other like machines for a year, assumed the risk of an injury to her hand caused by its being drawn under a roller through a jerky motion induced by the looseness of a belt; where the condition was one open to observation and known to the plaintiff.—Kupkofski v. John S. Spiegel Co., 135 Mich. 7.

Scope of employment as bearing on care and diligence of master, see ante § 34.
Duty to warn and instruct servant, see ante § 54.
Warnings and instructions to servant working outside scope of employment, see ante § 54e.
Evidence as to scope of employment, see post §§ 64a, 65a.
Jury questions as to scope of employment, see post § 67a.

¶ 837. Where a railway employee is injured while in the performance of work to which he was wrongfully assigned, and which he had never agreed to do, he is entitled to recover damages from the railroad company.—Jones v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 49 Mich. 573.

¶ 838. A servant cannot recover for injuries resulting from the master's assigning him to a different and more dangerous service than that for which he was employed, if he testifies that he was not going out of the scope of his duties when he went to the work and that the latter was in the line of his employment.—Alford v. Metcalf Brothers & Co., 74 Mich. 369.

¶ 839. An employee assumes all risk of accident from defects or dangers which are open, visible and apparent, this being true whether within or without the regular scope of his employment.—Walters v. Wolverine Portland Cement Co., 148 Mich. 315.

¶ 840. A servant, strong in body and mind, who uses a circular saw in his master's factory after instruction in the use by the master's agent, and has, for a year past, used it, and knows he may be called upon to use it at any time, assumes, by doing the work, all the risks of and incident thereto, even though the same is outside the scope of his employment and he protests when assigned to it.—Wheeler v. Berry, 95 Mich. 250.

¶ 841. A servant working overtime in the line of his employment is subject to its risks. —Kehoe v. Allen, 92 Mich. 464.

¶ 842. The fact that a servant is directed by a superior to perform a service outside of the scope of his employment, and is injured while attempting to perform such service, does not give him a right of action against the master for the injury so received, where the dangers of the service were apparent, and its performance undertaken without objection. So held where an experienced section man, while engaged, with the other members of the section gang, in moving a loaded car by forcibly shoving an empty car against it, was ordered by the section boss to climb upon the loaded car and set the brake, and was injured by the empty car's being pushed against him while he was climbing a ladder on the loaded car to execute the order.—Gavigan v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 110 Mich. 71.

¶ 843. An oiler of engines on a vessel who is taken away from his accustomed work and put into a dangerous place without warning or caution by one who stands in place of the master, whereby he falls into an open and unguarded hatchway, does not assume the risk of danger.—Brown v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 118 Mich. 205.

¶ 844. Running a line for a signal system for a manufacturing company is not outside the scope of employment of a man engaged as helper in the machine shop, so as to render the company liable for his death by electrocution.—Davis v. Port Huron Engine & Thresher Co., 126 Mich. 429.

¶ 845. An employee who was injured by the fall of a rack suspended from the ceiling of the room in which he worked, did not assume the risk of defective construction as it was no part of the employee's duty to examine or use the rack, nor was it obviously dangerous to one working near it.—Corbett v. American Screen Door Co., 133 Mich. 669.

¶ 846. An employee of a street railway company engaged in construction work, who was injured as the result of a car of his employer on which he was being transported on his way home from work, running into an open switch which had neither light nor target, did not assume the risk of such appliances as he had no duty which would have brought such defects to his attention.—Noe v. Rapid Ry. Co., 133 Mich. 152.

¶ 847. An employee who has worked in the packing department of a mill for several years and who is familiar with the machinery of the mill and its operation and who has occasionally been called in to help in the mill itself, cannot recover for an injury caused by getting his arm into a cog wheel while assisting to start the mill in the absence of one of the millers, this not being a case of wrongfully setting him to work outside of the scope of his employment.—Hathaway v. Washington Milling Co., 139 Mich. 708.

¶ 848. Inasmuch as an employee assumes all risks of accident apparent from defects or dangers which are open, visible and apparent, whether working within his regular scope of employment or not, an employee of a cement factory who was given two wrenches with orders to tighten the bolts in a tube mill that was standing still, and who was injured because the bolt slipped in the wrench and jerked causing him to slip and fall on his back and catching his arm between the trunnion and tire on the tube mill behind him which was being operated, cannot recover for his injuries, because whatever danger of injury there was from the machinery was perfectly apparent to one using ordinary care.—Walter v. Wolverine Portland Cement Co., 148 Mich. 315.

¶ 849. Where the deceased is employed to stay on shore and wheel sand to the mixer, and is shortly afterward directed to perform service on the water with a scow, he is directed to do a service outside his employment, and does not assume the risk unless the risk is plain, open, and obvious.—Snow v. Escanaba Power Co., 162 Mich. 579.

¶ 850. Where an inexperienced servant is put to dangerous work, or is sent into a dangerous place to work, outside of the scope of his employment, the master is liable for all injuries resulting to the servant from being exposed to unusual risks, which were not apparent, were not understood or appreciated by him, and could only be learned by experience in doing the work.—Lobenstein v. Whitehead & Kales Iron Works, 179 Mich. 279.

¶ 851. An employee who recognizes and appreciates the danger of obeying a command to perform a duty without the scope of his employment, assumes the risk of injury from obeying such order.—Hemmila v. Cleveland Cliffs Iron Co., 184 Mich. 567.

§ 56f. Risk from master's negligence or nonperformance of duty.

¶ 852. A servant does not assume the risk of the master's negligence, or of that of any one to whom the master entrusts his superintending authority.—Quincy Mining Co. v. Kitts, 42 Mich. 34.

¶ 853. Servants assume the ordinary risks of their employment, but not those extra hazards which spring from the failure of the master to exercise reasonable care in providing such rules and regulations for the conduct of his business as to afford his servants reasonable means of protection.—Irvine v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 89 Mich. 416.

¶ 854. Servants assume the ordinary risks of their employments, but not those extra hazards which spring from the failure of master to exercise reasonable care in providing such rules and regulations for the conduct of his business as to afford his servants reasonable means of protection.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 855. The poisoning of an employee by the drinking of poison, which had, for the purpose of cleaning, been placed in a water cooler furnished for the use of employees, was not an unexpected accident; but was just what should have been anticipated from putting the poison in the drinking water.—Geller v. Briscoe Mfg. Co., 136 Mich. 330.

¶ 856. For a servant to assume the risks of defective appliances and of the dangers incident to the place of employment, it is not enough that he knows the fact of certain conditions; he must know and understand the danger, or the danger must be so obvious that his appreciation of it is a necessary inference.—Delbusso v. American Cement Plaster Co., 165 Mich. 318.

¶ 857. An employee engaged in oiling a coal conveyor using a narrow walk alongside has the right to assume in the absence of notice that the walk is safe and without loose planks.—Clark v. Wolverine Portland Cement Co., 138 Mich. 673.

¶ 858. A servant of a manufacturing company working upon a boiler on a railroad switch in his employer's yard, where switching was done daily, assumed the risk of his employment, and his employer could not be held liable for injuries to him by being struck by a switch train while so employed, on the ground merely of a failure to furnish a safe place to work.—Breeze v. McKinnon Mfg. Co., 140 Mich. 372.

¶ 859. The lever of the clutch apparatus used for starting a milling machine was repaired in the afternoon, shortly before the hour of plaintiff's injury. The repair man failed to put in a cotter pin in a bolt in the lever. The bolt worked loose and plaintiff in attempting to operate the lever was injured. Held, plaintiff did not assume the risk.—Deary v. Hecla Co., 161 Mich. 677.

§ 56g. ——Of duty imposed by statute.

Statutory provisions and regulations, see ante § 35.

Duty to protect or guard dangerous machinery and places, see ante § 51.

Omission of statutory duty as bearing on contributory negligence, see post § 59a.

¶ 860. A servant does not assume the risk due to the omission of the employer to comply with a statute requiring that set-screws be covered and guarded, since the assumption of risk is the result of the contract of employment and the master cannot legally contract to violate a statute.—Sipes v. Michigan Starch Co., 137 Mich. 258.

¶ 861. The assumption of risk by a servant arises from the contract of employment, and the doctrine cannot be applied where a statutory duty has been neglected by the employer.—Murphy v. Grand Rapids Veneer Works, 142 Mich. 677.

¶ 862. An employee does not assume the risk attending the breach of a statutory duty by his employer.—Rivers v. Bay City Traction & Electric Co., 164 Mich. 696.

¶ 863. A servant does not assume the risk of the violation of a duty by a master though he continues in the service after knowledge of a breach of duty, where the duty is imposed by statute, since the master cannot legally contract for its violation.—Wallin v. Arcadia & B. River Ry. Co., 172 Mich. 466.

¶ 864. The doctrine that the employee does not assume the risk of dangers arising through the negligence of the employer does not apply where the negligence and the resulting danger are known to the employee before entering on the performance of the work, unless the risk grows out of the violation of a statutory provision for the protection of employees.—De Kallands v. Washtenaw Home Tel. Co., 153 Mich. 25.

¶ 865. Where a statute imposes a duty upon the employer for the protection of the employee, injury from the neglect of this duty is not one of the risks assumed by the employee.—Kleinfelt v. J. H. Somers Coal Co., 156 Mich. 473.

¶ 866. A plaintiff brakeman who was injured by reason of the failure of a railroad to provide automatic couplers, as required by Act No. 234, Pub. Acts 1907, cannot be held to have assumed the risk.—Betterly v. Boyne City, G. & A. R. Co., 158 Mich. 385.

¶ 867. Where a mine owner or operator fails to comply with Pub. Acts 1905, No. 100, § 3, requiring competent and trustworthy engineers for the operation of cages and hoisting devices, the defense of assumption of risk or negligence of a fellow-servant is not available against a miner injured by such noncompliance.—Layzell v. J. H. Somers Coal Co., 156 Mich. 268.

¶ 868. Section 3, Act No. 100, Pub. Acts 1905, provides "that only a competent and trustworthy engineer shall be permitted to operate the cages and hoisting devices in all coal mines in this state." Plaintiff was injured, while cleaning out the sump of the shaft, by the negligence of a fireman acting as engineer in letting down the cage. Held, that under the statute plaintiff was not a fellow-servant of the fireman, and did not assume the risk.—Capeling v. Saginaw Coal Co., 156 Mich. 437.

¶ 869. Inasmuch as the assumption of risk is the result of a contract of employment, and as the master cannot legally contract to violate a statute, he cannot, as against the servant, assert the doctrine of assumption of risk of unguarded gears and belts, even in case the omission of the statutory duty is known to the servant.—Swick v. Aetna Portland Cement Co., 147 Mich. 454, per Hooker and Carpenter, JJ., others concurring in the result.

¶ 870. Where defendant fails to provide a loose pulley upon which to shift the belt of a machine, in violation of the statute requiring such pulley, the plaintiff employee assumes, in tying the belt away from the machine, no risk not reasonably obvious to him. —Trombley v. McAfee, 152 Mich. 494.

¶ 871. Where a defendant employer has failed to comply with his statutory duty to supply a shaft with loose pulleys for shifting belts, the plaintiff employee does not assume the risk of injury.—Little v. Bousfield & Co., 154 Mich. 369.

¶ 872. Plaintiff's deceased was killed while operating a ripsaw, by being struck by a piece of timber thrown back by the saw. Defendant had failed to provide a guard for the saw, as required by statute and by the order of the factory inspector. Held, that the deceased did not assume the risk.—Van Doorn v. Heap, 160 Mich. 199.

¶ 873. A plaintiff injured by catching his arm in the belt and pulley connected with a roller used for crushing carbide does not assume the risk attendant upon the absence of the guards for such pulley and belt, which are ordered to be installed by Act No. 113, Public Acts 1901, § 8.—Johnson v. Union Carbide Co., 169 Mich. 651.

¶ 874. Where a factory owner has not fulfilled his statutory duty under Pub. Acts 1909, No. 285, How. St., 2nd Ed., § 4023, to properly guard set screws in removable chucks in a rotary veneer peeler the servant does not assume the risk of injury due to such defective appliances.—Edward v. Grand Haven Basket Factory, 187 Mich. 505.

¶ 875. A boy under sixteen employed in violation of Pub. Acts 1901, No. 113, § 3, at working at a machine feeding metal sheets through rollers, does not assume the risk attendant upon such work.—Sterling v. Union Carbide Co., 142 Mich. 284.

¶ 876. A child employed in disobedience to a statute does not assume the risk of violation of the statutory duty.—Syneszewski v. Schmidt, 153 Mich. 438.

¶ 877. Where the negligence of a boss renders the employment in which a child under sixteen years of age was engaged dangerous, hence rendering his employment a violation of Pub. Acts 1901, Act No. 113, the child cannot be said to have assumed the risk.—Syneszewski v. Schmidt, 153 Mich. 438.

(5 Mich. Dig. 64)

¶ 878. A child employed in violation of Act No. 113, Pub. Acts 1901, prohibiting the employment of children under sixteen where dangerous to life or limb, does not assume the risks of a fellow-servant's negligence.—Dalm v. Bryant Paper Co., 157 Mich. 550.

¶ 879. Rev. St. U. S., § 4477, providing that every steamer carrying passengers during the night, shall keep a suitable number of watchmen to guard against disaster and give alarms, has no application to a steamer which had been docked for the winter and upon which members of the crew were asleep, so as to make the owner liable, on the ground of failing to keep a watchman, for the death of one of such persons in a fire which broke out during the nighttime.—Lang v. H. W. Williams Transp. Line, 119 Mich. 80.

§ 56h. Reliance on assurance of safety or promise to repair.

Duty of master to inspect and repair, see ante § 53.

Contributory negligence in relying on promise to repair, see post § 59d.

¶ 880. A pressman has the right to rely upon the superior knowledge of his foreman, and his statement that the machine will not injure the servant, where the cause of improper working of the machine is a mechanism which is wholly concealed, and where the foreman is an expert, familiar with the mechanism and expressly charged by the master with the duty of inspecting and repairing. The doctrine of assumption of risk does not apply to such a case, as an employee who is in doubt about the safety of a machine may defer to the opinions and assurances of those who are supposed to know and who from their positions have special knowledge of the safety of the machine.—Burnside v. Novelty Mfg. Co., 121 Mich. 115.

¶ 881. Plaintiff, a timberman, injured by falling rock while cutting a hitch in which a timber called a stull was to be placed, held, not to have assumed the risk in accepting the judgment of his boss as to the safety of the place, and obeying his order to start to work. —Danula v. Quincy Min. Co., 166 Mich. 350.

¶ 882. Where a servant is induced to continue using a defective instrument by the master's promise to repair the same, he no longer assumes the obvious risk, whether the implement be a simple or complicated one.—Brouseau v. Kellogg Switchboard & Supply Co., 158 Mich. 312. (Brooke, Grant and McAlvay, JJ., dissenting.)

¶ 883. A workman who is operating a saw does not assume the risk of injury when the foreman is notified of defects therein and promises to repair it right away and the injury complained of is received two days after such promise but before repairs are made.—

Le Fleur v. Michigan Alkali Co., 175 Mich. 404.

¶ 884. A servant who continues in an employment with knowledge of a dangerous condition involving an abnormal risk, in reliance on the promise of his employer to remedy such condition, is relieved from the onus of having assumed the risk, during a reasonable time for making the promised repairs or changes.—Cole v. Mamer Brick Co., 183 Mich. 290.

¶ 885. Where no time is specified in which an employer is to make promised repairs or to remedy a defective or dangerous situation, his right to urge assumption of risk by an employee is suspended for a reasonable time in which to perform his promise.—Cole v. Mamer Brick Co., 183 Mich. 290.

¶ 886. On the expiration without performance of the time in which an employer promised to remedy a danger, an employee who remained in the service in reliance on such promise, thereafter assumed the risk of injury, his position being the same as if the promise had never been made.—Cole v. Mamer Brick Co., 183 Mich. 290.

¶ 887. An employee, who without intention of leaving his employment if repairs were not made, worked for an unreasonable length of time after the promise of his employer to make repairs assumed the risk of injury.—Cole v. Mamer Brick Co., 183 Mich. 290.

¶ 888. In determining what is a reasonable time to continue the use of an alleged defective switch-engine after promise to repair was made depends on circumstances, as for instance the frequency with which the engine was used, the danger of using it while out of repair, and the opportunity which the defendant had of repairing it.—Lyttle v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 84 Mich. 289.

¶ 889. Where the conductor of a freight train, pursuant to whose orders a hand rail on a way car had been removed for repair by a workman in the company's repair shop, was directed by the assistant superintendent to see that the rail was replaced, and where the conductor, after telling the workman again to repair and replace the rail, continued to use the car without protest until, owing to the absence of the rail, he was thrown from the car and killed, held, that he assumed the risk arising from the car's defective condition, and that the case was not within that exception to the general rule which obtains where the servant has been induced to continue the use of defective appliances by reason of the master's promise to repair.—Shackelton v. Manistee & N. E. R. Co., 107 Mich. 16.

§ 56i. Risk of complying with orders, commands or threats.

Rules and orders, see ante § 52.

Contributory negligence in complying with orders or requests, see post § 59n.

¶ 890. Where a foreman and an inferior employee have equal knowledge of the danger accompanying an act required by the foreman to be performed in respect to certain machinery, the employee can comply with the order or not as he chooses, and the employer is not liable if he is injured in complying, even though the dangerous nature of the act is not explained to him by the foreman.—Kean v. Detroit Copper & Brass Rolling Mills, 66 Mich. 277.

¶ 891. A direction by a railroad officer to his subordinate to perform an ordinary service, such as his employment contemplated—there being nothing unusual in the mode directed—is not such a special direction as will charge the company for an injury happening during the performance of such service.—Davis v. Detroit & M. R. Co., 20 Mich. 105.

¶ 892. If the master directs the servant to do some act which is dangerous, but which could be made safe by special care upon the part of the master, the servant has the right to assume that such special care will be taken; and, failing to exercise such care, the master is held liable.—Harrison v. Detroit L & N. R. Co., 79 Mich. 409.

¶ 893. A man of 51, who has been at work in a car factory for more than a year, has seen a grindstone trimmed, has been shown by the foreman how to do such trimming, and has actually engaged in the work for brief periods, and who, responding to an order to trim the stone, proceeds to obey and receives an injury through his own mismanagement of the means, sustains such injury from a danger that was apparently incident to the employment, the risks of which were assumed by him.—Melzer v. Peninsular Car Co., 76 Mich. 94.

¶ 894. Where a farm laborer among whose daily duties was the removal of ensilage from the silo for the purpose of feeding stock, took it, by his employer's direction, from the bottom of the pile, which thus became undermined so that part slid off, injuring him, held, that he assumed the risk, and that his employer was not liable.—Welch v. Brainard, 108 Mich. 38.

¶ 895. An employee in a lumber mill, who piles lumber on a dock when from his own observation he knows it is unsafe, and after he has been told by his employer's vice-principal not to work at such place, assumes the risk of an injury by the falling of the dock, although he is directed to work there by a foreman who is a vice-principal in giving the directions.—Soderstrom v. Holland-Emery Lumber Co., 114 Mich. 83.

¶ 896. Plaintiff was engaged in his usual employment of managing the retorts in the manufacture of wood alcohol. Defendant ordered him to help replace a derailed tram car, without acquainting him with the hidden dangers of the work, and plaintiff was injured. Held, that the sustaining of a demurrer on the ground that plaintiff had assumed the risk, was error.—Johnson v. Desmond Chemical Co., 152 Mich. 84.

¶ 897. In a suit by an employee for personal injuries sustained by reason of the frozen crest of a sand pile falling upon him, a verdict was improperly directed for defendant on the ground that plaintiff assumed the risk, where it appeared that defendant's vice-principal vehemently and with oaths ordered plaintiff to do the work upon the sand pile on pain of losing his job, and at the same time informed him that he had tested the crest of the pile and found that it was safe.—Brown v. Lennane, 155 Mich. 686. (Grant, C. J., Hooker and Ostrander, JJ., dissenting.)

¶ 898. An employee, when commanded to work in an unsafe place, does not assume the risk of injury unless the danger is so obvious and imminent that an ordinarily prudent person would not have obeyed such order.—Baucino v. Fitzpatrick, 186 Mich. 1.

¶ 899. An employee who was injured by the caving-in of a trench in which he was directed to enlarge the hole about the ends of water pipes so as to permit the calking of the joints, may rightfully assume that he would not be directed to work in an unsafe place.—Baucino v. Fitzpatrick, 186 Mich. 1.

¶ 900. Defendant sent a gang of men of which plaintiff was one to install a sprinkler system in the plant of a third person. He supplied step ladders to be used for the work. At the direction of defendant's foreman plaintiff picked up a straight ladder found in the building and belonging to said third person, and while using same was injured. Held, plaintiff having assumed the risk of the use of said ladder could not recover. Fellows v. Stevens, 170 Mich. 13. (Bird, J., dissenting.)

§ 56j. Risks from violation of rules, orders and instructions.

Rules and orders, see ante § 52.
Contributory negligence in disregarding rules and orders, see post § 59l.

¶ 901. Plaintiff, a locomotive engineer in defendant's employ, was in charge of a westbound special of eleven coaches. Thirty minutes in advance was another special. While the first train was standing on the tracks at the J. depot, the second crashed into the rear of it, and plaintiff was injured. It appeared that the semaphore east of the J. depot indicated that the tracks at the station were occupied, and that plaintiff, upon seeing the signal, attempted by means of the air brakes to stop his train, but that the brakes, for some unexpected and unaccountable reason, failed to work, though they had just recently operated perfectly. Plaintiff was an experienced engineer; was familiar with the rules and regulations of the company; knew that they required him to approach the station at J. upon the presumption that the track would be occupied; knew the location of the semaphore, and its use; and knew that the air brakes were ordinarily sufficient to stop the train. Neither he nor any one else had made complaint. Held, that he assumed the risk.—Whalen v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 114 Mich. 512.

¶ 902. Where the operator of a power driven wringer, who has been instructed to keep his fingers six inches away from the rollers, has so cut burlap which he is wrapping about the rollers as to leave loose threads, he assumes the risk of having his fingers entangled and drawn into the rollers.—Fryezynski v. W. W. Rice Leather Co., 171 Mich. 113.

¶ 903. Where a foreman of an automobile company tests cars upon a track having banked curves built by the company, it might well be said that such foreman assumes the risk of injury from driving on the curves at 40 miles per hour, which is contrary to rules, when the operation of the law of centrifugal force is well known to him, and he is familiar with the track.—Blick v. Olds Motor Works, 175 Mich. 640.

§ 56k. Voluntary acts of servant and improper methods of work.

Methods of work, see ante § 52.
Improper methods of work as bearing on contributory negligence, see post § 59h.

¶ 904. Where the sole act of negligence relied on is participated in and voluntarily consented to by the injured workman with full knowledge of the peril, his master cannot be held liable.—Hammond v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 83 Mich. 334.

¶ 905. An employee assumes the risk when he voluntarily enters into the danger apparent to him, notwithstanding an agent of his employer tells him there is no danger.—Toomey v. Eureka Iron & Steel Works, 89 Mich. 249.

¶ 906. A brakeman, who by permission sleeps in a caboose-car which during the night stands upon an extension track used to shove in cars upon, must be held to have accepted the risk of his car's being struck by such other cars, and he has no cause of action on account of injuries received in consequence of such condition.—Jacobs v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 84 Mich. 299.

¶ 907. An employee, by operating his employer's planer without a protecting hood, assumed the risk of using the machine as it was, and could not recover for injuries received while so working.—Erickson v. Cummer Mfg. Co., 140 Mich. 434.

¶ 908. Accidental injuries to a servant will not sustain an action against the master where they arise from the servant's voluntary use of machinery which he understands and to which no objection has been made as being peculiarly unsafe.—Richards v. Rough, 53 Mich. 212.

¶ 909. Where an employer furnished the means and a perfectly safe place and safe way for an experienced employee engaged on an elevated tramway in a lumber manufacturing plant to lift derailed cars upon the track, and the employee chose to use an unsafe place, he did so at his own risk.—Davey v. Hall & Munson Co., 122 Mich. 206.

¶ 910. An experienced employee who sustained injury by falling from an elevated tramway in a lumber manufacturing plant, through his voluntarily standing on the ends of a plank and using it as a fulcrum for lifting a derailed tramway car with full knowledge that the ends of the planks on the tramway needed repairs and that many were broken and it was dangerous to even walk on them, and without taking any notice of the plank on which he stood, and with knowledge that the space between the tracks was safe, assumed the risk of his action.—Davey v. Hall & Munson Co., 122 Mich. 206.

¶ 911. An employer is not liable where the servant is injured while using for the purposes of his work some material substance which happens to be in a convenient position, but which is not the property of the employer, and which is not used by his authority.—Fellows v. Stevens, 170 Mich. 13.

¶ 912. Where the operator of a power driven wringer, who has full knowledge of the position of the control, operates the machine without a helper, he assumes the risk. —Fryezynski v. W. W. Rice Leather Co., 171 Mich. 113.

¶ 913. A quarry laborer having been warned of blasts during his noon hour and selecting a place on the highway customarily used by other employees to eat their dinners, assumes the risk of being struck by a stone from a blast.—Moronen v. McDonnell, 177 Mich. 691.

¶ 914. An employer who furnishes suitable appliances is not answerable for an injury to a servant resulting from the adoption by himself and his fellow-servants, without the knowledge of the employer, of an improper method of performing work.—Poirer v. Bartlett Lumber Co., 182 Mich. 678.

¶ 915. In an action for wrongful death where plaintiff's intestate was killed while returning from work through the defendant railroad company's yard by being struck by the last car of a train running onto a trestle jumping the track while passing over a switch the company is not liable for his death where it appears that the deceased was using the particular route that he took for his own convenience, and that there were other ways provided for him to return from his work which were safe and which he had frequently used, and the use which he attempted to make of this particular way through the company's ground does not appear to have been known by the company or any of its officers or sanctioned by it.—O'Donnell v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co., 99 Mich. 174.

¶ 916. Where two car repairers are working together on a car, and one of them, having finished the work on which he is engaged, comes to the other and without request or direction assumes to assist the other, and is injured while doing so, such servant is not technically a volunteer, and is acting in the line of his duty, since the relation of master and servant existed, and he was employed to do similar work, yet in another sense he was a volunteer, in that he was not ordered or requested to do that particular work, nor was there any emergency requiring him to assume to do so without an order or request, so that the facts, although not precluding a recovery, have a significant bearing on the question of assumption of risk.—Gaines v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 193 Mich. 398.

¶ 917. The fact that an employee is directed by a fellow-servant to work in a dangerous place does not render the master liable for injuries resulting therefrom, where the work was directly in the line of his employment and he was familiar with the danger.—Middaugh v. Mitchell, 120 Mich. 581.

¶ 918. A driller engaged in a stone quarry, who forced a stick of dynamite into too small a hole in the rock, causing the explosion which resulted in the injury complained of, assumed the risk where he acted at the request of a fellow-servant, who had no right to direct him.—Kopf v. Monroe Stone Co., 133 Mich. 286.

¶ 919. A member of an engineer's crew of nine, on a steamer which had been docked for the winter, whose death was caused by a fire on the steamer during the nighttime while the crew was asleep, assumed the risk of sleeping upon the steamer in the absence of a watchman, where the only fire on the steamer was contained in a small upright pony boiler on deck, and the lights consisted of four to six ordinary kerosene lamps, and the deceased was familiar with the situation and must have known that the captain and the watchmen had left the boat.—Lang v. H. W. Williams Transp. Line, 119 Mich. 80.

Fellow-servant rule, see ante § 55.

¶ 920. In an action by a brakeman for an injury received by having an arm crushed while coupling cars, and in particular a car which had been brought by another road, the accident arising from the loosening and leaning down of dead-woods of one car which was lower than the other, it appeared that the different roads had their inspectors to examine cars, and there was nothing to indicate negligence on the part of any of the servants; held, the risk naturally attending the shifting of cars from one road to another is assumed as a part of the brakeman's duties, and the company is not liable for the injury where it may have been caused by the error or mistake of the company's car inspector, who was a fellow-servant.—Smith v. Potter, 46 Mich. 258.

¶ 921. Whether a brakeman can recover against the railway company for an injury received in consequence of the conductor's managing the locomotive in the engineer's absence, quære. Judgment denying such liability affirmed by equal division.—Rodman v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 55 Mich. 57.

¶ 922. A founder in a blast-furnace for the manufacture of pig-iron who has a separate department,—the inside work of the furnace,—and who has nothing to do with the other departments except when acting through the general management or the foreman or boss of such departments, is a fellow-servant of an engineer whose business it is to move the cars on the furnace track as desired in the business, and he assumes the risk that said cars may be handled negligently by said engineer.—Adams v. Iron Cliffs Co., 78 Mich. 271.

¶ 923. Where an engineer on a switch-engine allowed the engine to be operated under his direction by a fireman who had been employed for twenty months as a fireman and six months as a brakeman, and who had been accustomed to handle the engine, there was no such negligence as would enable a fellow-servant of the fireman to recover from the railroad company for an injury sustained in coupling a car to the engine while so operated.—Thompson v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 84 Mich. 281.

¶ 924. The contract of employment binds an employee to assume the danger of negligence of a coemployee whether he apprehends such danger or not.—Bauer v. American Car & Foundry Co., 132 Mich. 537.

¶ 925. An air hoist in a foundry was suspended from a horizontal track by means of an iron strap connected with a wheel kept in place by means of flanges and gravitation. After a beam had been moved, a coemployee neglected to move the hoist or change the air pressure and in starting the piston struck some object thereby throwing the wheel off the track and in falling it struck and injured plaintiff. He had been employed in the foundry for five weeks and was familiar with and had used the hoist. A similar hoist had fallen a short time before, which fact was known to the assistant foreman but not to plaintiff. Held that he assumed the risk of injury from such obvious danger and from the negligence of the coemployee.—Bauer v. American Car & Foundry Co., 132 Mich. 537.

¶ 926. Where employer and employee have equal knowledge of the incompetency of a fellow-servant who is retained in the service, each party assumes the risk, unless the employer undertakes to give special directions.—Jackson v. Schillinger Bros. Co., 182 Mich. 504, 7 N. C. C. A. 576.

¶ 927. The risk of injury from the failure of miners to properly examine, trim down or sound a drift to determine its safety, is assumed by a trammer removing rock and débris preparatory to timbering the drift.—Koskell v. Newport Min. Co., 182 Mich. 586.

¶ 928. Plaintiff, operating a hand feeding rip-saw machine for defendant, thoroughly understood the machine and knew that "fly-backs" might occur; that in such event the safe thing to do was to turn off the power; that the power lever was not accessible to him; and that the tailer, being a foreigner, would not understand his orders. He nevertheless continued his work and was injured by a "fly-back" which threw his hand upon the saw. Held, he could not recover, having assumed the risk of the tailer's ignorance and that incident to the location of the control lever.—Burton v. Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co., 166 Mich. 45.

¶ 929. The mere fact that a master, by supplying clubs to be slipped through the rings of a hatch-cover for use in removing said cover from the deck of a ship would have made the process of removal less hazardous to his servants, is not sufficient to entitle a plaintiff employee to recover for personal injuries on the ground of negligence, where said hatch-cover might have been safely removed without the use of such clubs.—Cribb v. Great Lakes Engineering Works, 167 Mich. 328.

¶ 930. A servant assumes the risk of injury from the carelessness of fellow-servants, provided they have been prudently chosen and not retained in the employer's service after he has knowledge of their unfitness or negligence.—Quincy Mining Co. v. Kitts, 42 Mich. 34.

¶ 931. A servant assumes the risk of a fellow-servant's negligence, even though the latter is in a position of greater responsibility or a different line of employment, so long as both are in the same general business, so that the negligence of one may contribute to the danger of the other.—Quincy Mining Co. v. Kitts, 42 Mich. 34.

¶ 932. It would seem that at common law a brakeman assumes the risk of injury where he continues in the service after knowledge of the incompetency of the conductor because of habitual intemperance.—Wallin v. Arcadia & B. River Ry. Co., 172 Mich. 466.

§ 56m. ——Of incompetent fellow-servants.

Statutory provisions regulating employment of servants, see ante §§ 35, 36.

Infants employed in violation of statute as fellow-servants, see ante § 55e.

¶ 933. A railroad employee having knowledge of the unfitness of another employee of the same company, or one whose position or duties are such that he ought to be acquainted with such unfitness when it had become notorious, and who does not give information to the company of the unfitness thus actually or constructively known to him, takes upon himself all the risks of injury from such unfitness while engaged in the ordinary performance of his duties, as much as if he had expressly contracted with reference to possible injuries from that cause.—Davis v. Detroit & M. R. Co., 20 Mich. 105.

¶ 934. Where the reasons which are relied upon to charge the officers of the company with knowledge apply with equal force to show the knowledge of the plaintiff, the negligence of the latter in not complaining is as great as that of the company in employing an incompetent person. And where employer and employee have equal knowledge, and the latter continues the service, each party takes the risk, unless the employer undertakes to give special directions.—Davis v. Detroit & M. R. Co., 20 Mich. 105.

¶ 935. The molder whom a boy was instructed to assist was perfectly familiar with his ability, had worked with him and beside him, and had seen him do work requiring as much strength as that in which he and the boy were about to engage. Held, that, by accepting the service of the boy without objection, the molder estopped himself from claiming that the common employer is liable for a weakness on the part of the boy unknown to the foreman.—Jungnitsch v. Michigan Malleable Iron Co., 105 Mich. 270.

¶ 936. Where a laborer was injured through being struck and run over by a work train while making repairs to a switch, the railroad company is not liable where the locomotive was in charge of an engineer and fireman, who with plaintiff and others employed were under the orders and required to obey the foreman of the construction gang, and the train which had remained stationary for a long time, was by order of the foreman and without warning moved, and no lookout was stationed upon the flat car; failure to give signals, if required, having been the fault of the engine men, who were clearly fellow-servants of plaintiff, all being engaged in the common enterprise of double-tracking defendant's road, and the foreman being ignorant of plaintiff's position and there being nothing in the record to support the theory that defendant owed to plaintiff the duty to maintain a lookout on the car.—Burrman v. Grand Trunk W. Ry., 143 Mich. 689.

¶ 937. In an action for personal injuries by one employed as a cager, whose duties were to place coal cars upon the elevator operated in the mine shaft in order to hoist them to the surface, and who was injured by being caught between a loaded car and the car he was moving, which had been started by another miner down an incline leading to the shaftroom, the risk of employment that an intermeddler or a miner would do what he had no right or authority to do was held to have been assumed by the cager.—Sommers v. Standard Min. Co., 146 Mich. 111.

¶ 938. Plaintiff, a section hand, was employed by defendant railroad in clearing up a wreck. He was directed to board defendant's engine and ride to town to his dinner, and to bring the dinners of other employees back with him. While so riding he was killed in a collision. Held, that riding on the engine was one of the ordinary incidents of his employment, and plaintiff assumed the risk of injury due to the negligence of the employees in charge of the engine.—Moyer v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 159 Mich. 645.

¶ 939. Act No. 104, Pub. Acts 1909, §§ 4110-4116, How. St., 2nd Ed., absolves railway employees from the assumption of risk of the negligence of fellow-servants.—Boesler v. Copper Range R. Co., 184 Mich. 430.

¶ 940. Act 104, P. A. 1909, sec. 1, How. 2nd Ed., § 4110, providing that any common carrier railroad shall be liable to its employees for damages resulting from its negligence or that of its officers, agents or employees eliminates the doctrine of the assumption of the risk of the negligence of fellow-servants and this construction is not discredited by section 2 providing that such employee does not assume the risk of his employment where a violation of a statute by the carrier enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the injury.—Quick v. Detroit & M. R. Co., 175 Mich. 676.

¶ 941. Act No. 104, P. A. 1909, providing that common carrier railroads are liable to employees for injuries caused by negligence of the company, its officers, agents or employees, and that contributory negligence does not bar recovery if of a lesser degree than that of the company and that contracts of employment do not release the company, is intended to change the fellow-servant doctrine.—Arends v. Grand Rapids Ry. Co., 172 Mich. 448.

§ 56n. Miners' risks.

Duty to provide safe mines and mining equipment, see ante § 50.

Mine employees as fellow-servants, see ante § 55p.

Contributory negligence of miners, see post § 59g.
Jury questions as to assumption of risks, see post § 67t.

¶ 942. A pumpman employed in a mine long enough to raise a presumption of acquaintance with the system under which it was worked will be deemed to have assumed the risk of having the duties of watchman performed by the shift boss.—Williams v. Verona Min. Co., 149 Mich. 45.

¶ 943. Where a plaintiff was engaged in shoveling clay into cars at the bottom of a high clay hill, from which other workmen were loosening the chunks of clay, and plaintiff was injured by the rolling down of a huge piece of clay not set in motion by any one, the defendant, employer of the plaintiff, was not liable, as plaintiff had assumed the obvious risks of the employment.—Ritzema v. Valley City Brick Co., 152 Mich. 75.

¶ 944. Plaintiff had formerly been employed as a timber man in the fifteenth level of defendant's mine. He left the mine for a time, and then returned to work in the same level. Meanwhile defendant had built a chute or raise directly under the iron rail track in the fifteenth level, and leading down to the sixteenth level. The raise was seven feet long and four feet wide, the whole extending out about one foot on each side of the track. The chute was covered by boards as to the space between the rails. Plaintiff worked for some time in the mine and passed the chute many times. A light was customarily put there as a warning. Plaintiff was never told of the chute and did not learn of it until the injury. Held, it was a question for the jury whether the plaintiff should be so charged with knowledge of the chute as to be held to have assumed the risk.—Kaukola v. Oliver Iron Mining Co., 159 Mich. 689.

¶ 945. Assuming that an employer is negligent in not providing a mine elevator with a reasonably safe appliance for and a method of signaling the engineer, thereby subjecting his employees to extraordinary dangers, there is no presumption that the employees assume the risk by the contract of hiring.—Delbusso v. American Cement Plaster Co., 165 Mich. 318.

¶ 946. Where an inexperienced employee in a mine ascends from a shaft by catching hold of a bucket, being the means shown him by an experienced employee from whom he was supposed to take directions, and the hoisting cable breaks resulting in his injury, the employer cannot contend that plaintiff should have walked up on the foot walk, and plaintiff did not assume the risk and was not guilty of contributing negligence.—Maki v. Mohawk Min. Co., 176 Mich. 497.

¶ 947. An experienced workman who had charge of the attaching of a guy rope to a pulley stand and had made same taut by means of a bar, held to have assumed the risk of injury due to the breaking of the rope at its point of contact with the bar, he having full knowledge of the extent of the strain and being in a better position than anyone else to determine its safety.—Cusick v. Tamarack Mining Co., 179 Mich. 91.

¶ 948. An employee does not assume the risk of injury from a defectively constructed raise or chute in a mine intended as a means of descent to loosen clogged ore in the adjoining compartment of the raise, and which his foreman directed him to use for that purpose, since the doctrine of safe place applies.—Ranta v. Newport Min. Co., 180 Mich. 459.

¶ 949. A timberman, whose duty it is to make a mine safe for others to work in, assumes the risk of injury from falling rock while so engaged.—Juntunen v. Quincy Min. Co., 184 Mich. 341.

¶ 950. A mine timberman, who is engaged in working in a mine shaft between levels in repairing and making safer for use by those using a ladderway intermediate platforms, or "sollers," which are used to stop anything from falling through the ladderway or to catch a man's body, assumes the risk of the falling of rock while engaged at such work.—Drajicevic v. Champion Copper Co., 194 Mich. 306.

¶ 951. Workmen engaged to inspect, repair and make safe a tool, piece of machinery, appliance, or place of work, which is defective, out of repair, or dangerous, assume the added risk incident to the existing conditions of the work or place.—Gaines v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 193 Mich. 398.

§ 56o. Employees in factories, shops and mills.

Duty of master to protect and guard dangerous machinery and places, see ante § 51.
Jury questions as to assumption of risk, see post § 67r.

¶ 952. A servant who continues without objection to use machinery which he has found to be unsafe assumes the risk, and cannot recover for injuries which he may receive in consequence of doing so.—Richards v. Rough, 53 Mich. 212.

¶ 953. The mere fact that one employed in manufacturing Paris green knows it is a poison will not defeat his action for injuries if he is not informed of the effect it may produce upon one working without due precaution.—Fox v. Peninsular White Lead & Color Works, 84 Mich. 676.

¶ 954. A machinist who has worked in a shop for four years must be held to have assumed the risks arising from defects in the machinery of which he had knowledge.—

Breig v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 98 Mich. 222.

¶ 955. In places like sawmills, appliances more or less crude may reasonably be expected, and employees who use them are ordinarily as good judges of their safety as the employer. If unsafe, and the employee still consents to use them, the risk is his; and the employer has a right to expect that the employee assumes it, where the nature of the appliance, and its dangers are obvious. —Lamotte v. Boyce, 105 Mich. 545.

¶ 956. There is no obligation upon the part of an employer to make his premises and machinery perfectly safe, or to have the most approved appliances. His duty to provide reasonably safe machinery is qualified by his right to contract for the use of machinery which falls short of the best and most approved; and when the defect is obvious, and cannot escape ordinarily careful observation, which is always due from the employee, the risks attendant upon such use are assumed by the employee.—Lamotte v. Boyce, 105 Mich. 545.

¶ 957. An employee who, in the line of his duty, has frequently oiled a revolving shaft at a point within four inches of a set screw, although required to enter a dark recess for that purpose, cannot recover for injuries received by reason of his clothing coming in contact with the screw while he was leaning over the shaft, without a light, to perform another service.—Sakol v. Rickel, 113 Mich. 476.

¶ 958. An experienced millhand familiar with the premises, and to whose attention a projecting set-screw on a shaft had been called, at which time he was informed of the danger therefrom, assumes the risk of working near the shaft and no recovery can be had for injuries causing his death, resulting from being caught in the set-screw.—Middaugh v. Mitchell, 120 Mich. 581.

¶ 959. A plaintiff in a personal injury case, 45 years old, acquainted by actual occupation with machinery, who is put to work upon a new planer of simple construction which he as much as his principal knows to be dangerous for use in planing short pieces of wood, and who continues at the work for eleven months, having in the meantime complained to the employer who assured him that it was not dangerous but did not give any promise of change in the machine or its condition, assumes the risk, and cannot recover.—Rohrabacher v. Woodard, 124 Mich. 125.

¶ 960. A wire screen over a hole in a partition built to protect a sawyer from flying sawdust if it can be said to obstruct the sawyer's vision is apparent to an assistant at the saw and he assumes the risk.—Kellogg v. Stephens Lumber Co., 125 Mich. 222.

¶ 961. A servant twenty years of age with four years' experience with machinery although not familiar with pulleys and belts assumes the risk of injury sustained while applying anti-slip compound to a pulley in accordance with instructions where the evidence shows it to be a simple process the dangers of which he must have known.—Cantwell v. John Brennan & Co., 125 Mich. 349.

¶ 962. An employee in a shingle mill assumes the risk of injury to his hand by contact with the saw caused by the accumulation of bark and sawdust underneath a pivoted table preventing it from clearing the saw. Such failure or defect should have been apparent to one shown to have had several years' experience in and around the mill work.—Willis v. Besser-Churchill Co., 126 Mich. 659.

¶ 963. An operator at a wabble saw does not assume the risk of injury where the defects are not apparent, no warning was given and he knew nothing of the danger.—Chilson v. Lansing Wagon Works, 128 Mich. 43.

¶ 964. A woman of mature years, of sufficient intelligence so that she is put at the head of a department where she operates machinery driven by a belt which she puts on and off as occasion requires for a long time, assumes the risk of injury therefrom though by the placing of a tank it became necessary to push the belt to the left in taking it off instead of to the right as she had done before, since any danger in so doing was as apparent to her as to anyone. —Price v. United States Baking Co., 130 Mich. 500.

¶ 965. An employee planing hoops on a planer constructed for the purpose, injured by a hoop thrown back because of a roller coming out of place, must be held to have assumed the risk where the roller had become displaced occasionally for two months before the accident, and been replaced by the millwright in a certain way which would hold it in place for a time when it would again become loose and have to be replaced, the same thing having occurred on the morning of the accident, so that the employee knew it was likely to occur, and there was nothing concealed about the danger, the whole machinery being open to his observation.—Fischer v. Goldie, 132 Mich. 574.

¶ 966. An experienced workman employed in constructing a hoisting apparatus for unloading coal from vessels, with which work he was familiar, assumes the risk of working upon a platform which he had helped to construct, the danger being as apparent to him as to anyone.—Cronin v. Russel Wheel & Foundry Co., 132 Mich. 500.

¶ 967. Plaintiff was injured while operating a hoisting apparatus consisting of a wheel turned by an endless rope kept in place by means of blocks nailed along the edge, some of which had split off. The injury was caused by the rope getting out of line and running off the wheel. Held, that the defect was apparent and that he was as well able to judge of the necessity of keeping the rope in line as was the employer, and that, being an adult and familiar with the appliance, he must be held to have assumed the risk.—Bays v. Warren Featherbone Co., 131 Mich. 205.

¶ 968. An employee assumes the risk of injury from an emery wheel bursting on account of high speed, where he is shown to be thoroughly familiar with the machines, to have put wheels upon them, to have seen the wheel in question put upon the machine and to have known that it was not ordinarily so used.—Randa v. Detroit Screw Works, 134 Mich. 343.

¶ 969. An employee who sustained injury through the breaking of an emery belt in an establishment in which he had for two years used such belts and knew that they frequently broke, assumed the risk of his employment, where the employer had furnished a sound belt and a competent inspector and repairer, and where the condition of the belt in question was as apparent to such employee as to any one, and where no complaint had been made by him that the belt in question was unfit for use.—Taylor v. Withington & Cooley Mfg. Co., 136 Mich. 652.

¶ 970. Any risk incident to the fact that the servant was short of stature and could not easily reach a lever on a machine which he had previously operated and knew is as much known to him as to the master and is assumed.—Dutchowski v. Handy Things Co., 141 Mich. 11.

¶ 971. A mason working inside of an oven and hearing a foreman say that he would turn on a blower to cool the oven is charged with knowledge that the resulting air current will stir up dust and ashes, even though he does not know where the blower enters the oven; and hence he assumes the risk by remaining inside and failing to warn the other, his superior, not to turn it on.—Page v. Battle Creek Pure Food Co., 142 Mich. 17.

¶ 972. In a personal injury case where the plaintiff, 27 years old, was injured through using a machine used for cutting steel plates, had operated the machine for one year, and perfectly understood its operation, he assumes the risk of injury where he continued to work the machine after knowing a defect therein and that it was not remedied although he had informed the master of the defect.—Goga v. American Car & Foundry Co., 142 Mich. 340.

¶ 973. Plaintiff in an action for personal injuries, who testified that he was an "oiler, sweeper, and grinder into the wet end" of a cement factory, and who was expected to do anything he was directed to do, and who so understood his employment, was acting within the scope of his employment and was not called upon to do work with which he was unfamiliar and whose ordinary dangers he did not understand when he was ordered to open a cock in an air pipe with a wrench, having performed such an act before.—Swick v. Aetna Portland Cement Co., 147 Mich. 454, per Hooker and Carpenter, JJ., others concurring in result.

¶ 974. Where it appears that plaintiff had worked in defendant's sawmill for five or six years, and knew that the place to work provided by defendant was unsafe, if it was in fact unsafe, or would have known it if he had exercised reasonable care, he cannot recover for an injury resulting from working in such unsafe place.—Younggren v. I. Stephenson Co., 150 Mich. 488.

¶ 975. A servant employed in placing steel sheets between the upper and lower plates of a steel press assumed the risk of injury in putting his hand between the plates to put a sheet of steel in position, which he knew was dangerous.—Richards v. Michigan Pressed Steel Co., 155 Mich. 668.

¶ 976. A manufacturer is not required to discard expensive machinery because not up to date; but may use it if he can find persons willing to operate it, and such persons, if they know the danger of such operation, assume the risk thereof.—Burgess v. Humphrey Bookcase Co., 156 Mich. 345.

¶ 977. An employee attempting to put a belt on a moving pulley assumes the risk of being caught, where the device is simple and the danger obvious.—Neifert v. Metler, 165 Mich. 354.

¶ 978. Plaintiff was employed to clean out the vat used in a paper factory for washing pulp. Inside the vat were paddles operated by an upright and counter-lying shaft, the paddles being put into motion by the shifting of a belt from a loose to a tight pulley. Assistants of the defendant owner's millwright were sent to repair this belt. After their arrival and while they were employed in repairing the belt, plaintiff went into the vat. The millwrights shifted the belt, thereby starting the machinery and injuring plaintiff. Held, the case was not one of assumption of the ordinary risks incident to plaintiff's employment, and to establish a defense based on "assumed risk" it must be shown that under the facts plaintiff, having been warned and given notice of danger in case he went into the tank, in this special instance assumed the risk.—Courtois v. King Paper Co., 172 Mich. 305.

§ 56p. Linemen.

¶ 979. An experienced electric lineman who is employed to repair generally a line which is old and to change the form of construction, and is thoroughly familiar with the condition of the wires and poles, assumes the risk of injury from a shock due to a defective condition of the line.—Baxter v. City of Lansing, 190 Mich. 542.

¶ 980. The telephone lineman assumes the risk of dangers arising from the contact of other highly charged wires with telephone wires which he is engaged in erecting, and of the grounding of telephone wires.—De Kallands v. Washtenaw Home Tel. Co., 153 Mich. 25.

¶ 981. A lineman engaged in the erection of trolley wires for an electric railway company, who continues in its employment with knowledge that no inspection of poles is being made by the company, assumes the risk.—Lynch v. Saginaw Valley Traction Co., 153 Mich. 174.

¶ 982. No recovery can be had for injury to an experienced lineman caused by the breaking of a wooden pole which he was climbing, it having become decayed at the point where it joined an iron pole of which it was an extension, where it was part of the lineman's duty to inspect the poles and repair or report if defective, there being no evidence that the pole in question had been reported defective, nor of any more practical system of inspection, nor anything to show that the company had any reason to suppose that the pole was defective.—Krimmel v. Edison Illuminating Co., 130 Mich. 613.

¶ 983. A lineman does not assume the risk of injury from the breaking and falling of poles caused by the negligence of other linemen who set the poles two years before, with whom he did not sustain the relation of coemployee, and whose acts were unknown and unknowable to him; but he assumed only such risks as were incident to the use of proper poles for the length of time since they were first set.—Livingway v. Houghton County St. Ry. Co., 145 Mich. 86.

§ 56q. Workers about sewers, ditches and excavations.

¶ 984. An experienced boiler-man, 52 years old, who for 10 months before his death had full charge of defendant's boiler room, and whose death was caused by the bursting of a pipe connecting with a sewer, assumed the risk attendant upon the use of the pipe, where it had been taken down and put up at his own direction by a laborer, and where he failed to supervise it after having been informed of its defective condition, although it was his duty to keep the pipe in working order.—Mackey v. Newberry Furnace Co., 119 Mich. 552.

¶ 985. A servant of mature years who has been employed for some years in laying gas pipe in ditches over which, according to defendant, he had some supervision, and concerning which he never made any complaint, assumes the risk of injury from a caving in of the sides of the ditch while working on the pipe therein, without express directions, where no danger is apparent on examination made by him and shoring was available for use when needed.—Foley v. Grand Rapids Gaslight Co., 127 Mich. 671.

¶ 986. An experienced digger of sewer trenches in which such sewer digger was at work, who, when spoken to by the contractor as to the curbing of the trench, did not think it was necessary, assumed the risk of the ground caving in because of the lack of curbing.—Lenderink v. Village of Rockford, 135 Mich. 581.

¶ 987. Where a member of a gang employed in excavating a ship canal knows the shovels are operated without signals, and continues to work with this knowledge, he assumes the risk of such manner of operation.—Dunn v. Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co., 161 Mich. 551.

¶ 988. Among the several gangs of laborers employed in excavating a ship canal was the pipe gang, whose duty it was to extend the air and water pipes used for the air drills and shovels. Plaintiff was a member of this gang. Two parallel lines of track were laid for the cars used to carry off the rock. Plaintiff was ordered by the foreman of his gang to adjust a valve on a pipe lying between the two lines of track, upon which cars were standing ready to be filled. While he was so engaged, the shovel gang caused a shovelful of rock to be lifted into one of the cars, and a rock fell off and injured plaintiff. Plaintiff knew that rocks often fell off the shovel and that the shovel was at that moment being operated. Held, he assumed the risk of the injury.—Dunn v. Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co., 161 Mich. 551.

¶ 989. The rule requiring the master to provide a safe place to work has no application to a case where a servant was injured while wheeling sand to the factory by a frozen crust of a sand pile breaking off after it had been undermined by him, there being no danger in doing the work except such as arose during the progress of the work as a necessary incident to the work itself.—Livingstone v. Saginaw Plate Glass Co., 146 Mich. 236.

Statutory provisions as to employment of railroad workers, see ante § 36.

Duty to provide safe tracks and other railroad equipment, see ante § 49.

Methods of operating or unloading trains, see ante § 52a.

Fellow-servant rule as applied to railroad employees, see ante § 55j.

Under Federal Employers' Liability Act, see post § 58.

Contributory negligence of railroad employees, see post §§ 59f, 591.
Jury questions as to assumption of risks, see post § 67s.

¶ 990. Railroad employees are presumed to be aware and take the risk of dangers from such conditions and defects in the construction of a side track as would be open to observation; and they are also expected to use reasonable care in examining their surroundings.—Batterson v. Chicago & G. T. Ry. Co., 53 Mich. 125.

¶ 991. A railway employee cannot recover for an injury arising from the improper construction of a side track if he had equal means of knowledge with the defendant of the defect and did not protest against it.—Hewitt v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 67 Mich. 61.

¶ 992. If a railroad employee, knowing, or having ample means of knowing, from long-continued employment, the way and manner in which the side tracks are used, continues in the employment without complaint, and is thereby subjected to risks of accident, he is presumed to assume such risks, and, if injured thereby, cannot recover.—Hewitt v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 67 Mich. 61.

¶ 992a. The doctrine of assumption of risk affords a railroad company no relief from its duty of protecting its employees from unnecessary and dangerous pitfalls and unusual conditions in respect to matters with which their employment brings them into contact.—Ragan v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co., 91 Mich. 379.

¶ 993. A trackman who, knowing the rule that notice is not given of the passage of extra trains, remains in the company's employ, assumes the risk.—Jolly v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 93 Mich. 370.

¶ 994. The general rule imposing upon a railroad company the duty of furnishing its employees a safe place in which to work is subject to the qualifications that, when a new road is being built, the employee cannot complain of its imperfect condition, but must take the risks naturally incident to such employment, such as trees close to the track, and that he assumes greater risks upon such a road than upon a completed one, where he might expect that the track was clear and all obstructions removed.—Manning v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 105 Mich. 260.

¶ 995. The risk of injury from coupling cars supplied with double deadwoods is assumed by one of some previous experience who has been in the company's employ several weeks during which time such cars have been in constant use.—Fenlon v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co., 108 Mich. 284.

¶ 996. A railroad employee was injured while coupling a car that was lower than the rest; he had fully understood the danger, yet had not protested to his employers against the use of the car, nor received any assurance that its use would be discontinued. Held, that the company was not liable.—Fort Wayne, J. & S. R. Co. v. Gildersleeve, 33 Mich. 133; Botsford v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 33 Mich. 256.

¶ 997. A railroad employee who, while walking beside and pushing a car by the hand rail along a track-siding in the railroad yard in the night time, struck his shoulder against a coal bin close to the track, was chargeable with knowledge that he was liable to encounter such obstruction and assumed the risk of meeting it.—Pahlan v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 122 Mich. 232.

¶ 998. A provision in a contract of employment between a railroad and an employee wherein the latter before exposing himself in working with cars, engines, machinery or tools agrees to ascertain their condition and soundness merely obligates the employee to use care, and will not prevent a recovery for injuries received because of the defective condition of a pilot of which he was ignorant, never having seen it before, and did not discover.—Barschow v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 147 Mich. 226.

¶ 999. Although a section man engaged in unloading rails from a moving train assumed the risk of the dangers incident to the business so far as they were understood or apparent, he did not assume the risk of the negligent acts of the roadmaster in charge of the train, in giving no warning and in unduly hastening the unloading.—LaBarre v. Grand Trunk W. Ry. Co., 133 Mich. 192.

¶ 1000. A section hand has a right to assume that the railroad company has furnished a proper car and had it loaded in a proper manner and hence does not assume the risk of injury caused by the derailment of a handcar on which he was riding and which was thrown from the track by striking a piece of hardwood which had fallen from an open rack car loaded with refuse from a planing mill, though he had seen the car as it passed by and thought it was dangerous to load cars in that manner.—McLean v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 137 Mich. 482.

¶ 1001. Where a section hand is instructed by the foreman to ride on an engine instead of in the usual way, the increase of danger is obvious, and is assumed by the former.—Moyer v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 159 Mich. 645.

¶ 1002. Defendant railroad had a spur branch some ten miles long, leading off into some timberland through a sparsely settled district, said branch being solely for the purpose of serving said timberland. No regular stations or stopping places existed, cars being loaded at any point along the tracks. Plaintiff's intestate was employed in defendant's crew engaged in extending said branch. He knew that it was customary to leave freight cars loaded at any point along said line. On a work train returning after dark, the intestate was placed on the front car with a lantern to look out for loaded cars and to signal the engineer, the engine being at the intestate's suggestion placed at the rear of the train. A collision with the loaded car occurred, resulting in the death of plaintiff's intestate. Held, the intestate assumed the risk and plaintiff could not recover.—Ingersoll v. Detroit & M. Ry. Co., 168 Mich. 380.

¶ 1003. Where defendant's car was placed upon a repair track for repair of a certain defect noted by defendant's inspector for repair, and plaintiff, who was a car repairer for defendant, upon going under the car to repair such defect was injured by a drawbar suddenly falling upon him by reason of broken carrying irons which had not been discovered and reported by the inspectors, and was not known to defendant, held that plaintiff assumed the risk.—Sims v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. Ry. Co., 196 Mich. 114.

§ 57a. ——Brakemen and switchmen.

¶ 1004. The risk arising from the use of worn rails for side tracks in a railroad yard is one of the ordinary risks of a switchman's employment.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Austin, 40 Mich. 247.

¶ 1005. An experienced brakeman was ordered by the conductor to attach a car loaded with lumber which projected forward and compelled him to stoop in making the coupling. In doing so he delayed a little, and his fingers were caught in the coupling-link, and hurt. Held, that he could not maintain an action against the railway company, as he fully understood the difficulty to be guarded against, and the conductor was not shown to have been in fault in any way.—Day v. Toledo, C. S. & D. R. Co., 42 Mich. 523.

¶ 1006. A switchman had his hand crushed while coupling a freight car furnished with double deadwoods, and received from another road where such a contrivance was generally used. He had not been expressly notified that he would be required to handle such cars, but in the course of commerce, and as a matter of business necessity as well as of statutory obligation, they were being constantly received and forwarded like all other cars adapted to the gauge of the road, and having occasion to run thereon. Held, that the switchman could not maintain a suit against the company as for negligent injury in receiving the cars or in omitting to notify him thereof.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Smithson, 45 Mich. 212.

¶ 1007. The omission of a railroad company to warn an inexperienced brakeman of the specific danger of coupling cars that are furnished with double deadwoods does not make the company liable for an injury received by him in so doing, if the risk is such as to be manifest to any person, and if, on being employed, he was warned in general terms of the perils of coupling cars of different construction, and was told not to take any chances.—Hathaway v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 51 Mich. 253.

¶ 1008. A youth of ordinary intelligence was killed while coupling freight cars. He was fully aware of the danger of such work, and not entirely inexperienced, and his death was not caused by any negligence or carelessness of those in charge of the train. Held, that the railroad company was not answerable for his death.—Viets v. Toledo, A. A. & G. T. R. Co., 55 Mich. 120.

¶ 1009. Where a switchman, who is acquainted with all of the surroundings, attempts to descend a car ladder for the purpose of uncoupling the car, knowing that unless the train is stopped he must strike a post less than twenty feet distant, and without knowing that his signal to stop the train has been received and acted upon, and in order to give which he was obliged to look towards the engine, and must have seen the steam emitted therefrom, which is alleged in the declaration to have prevented the engineer from seeing the signal, he must be held to have assumed the risk and danger in descending the ladder.—Pennington v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 90 Mich. 505.

¶ 1010. Where a brakeman while attempting the third time to couple cars on a side track slipped upon a snow-bank, of which he had no knowledge, and which had been formed by shoveling the snow from the siding, no space being cleared along the rail and the other side being dangerous by reason of coal docks, it was held that the accident was caused by defendant's negligent operation of its road, and plaintiff did not assume the risk.—Cregg v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 91 Mich. 624.

¶ 1011. Where an ordinarily intelligent person of mature age voluntarily attempts, though cautioned, to perform, without previous experience, the duties of a brakeman, he must be regarded as assuming the ordinary risks of his employment, and cannot recover for an injury caused by a danger that is apparent.—Dysinger v. Cincinnati, S. & M. R. Co., 93 Mich. 646.

¶ 1012. A railroad company that furnishes safe cars and a competent inspector thereof is not liable to a brakeman injured while seeking to couple, to another car, a properly constructed car which has been accepted by the inspector from another company for transportation, but over the end of which part of the lumber wherewith it is laden projects so as to injure such brakeman.—Dewey v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 97 Mich. 329.

¶ 1013. A brakeman will be held to have assumed the risk of injury from an imperfect kind of drawbar in use on the road on which he is employed, where he has daily used such drawbars, and is therefore familiar with the dangers attending their use.—Secord v. Chicago & M. L. S. R. Co., 107 Mich. 540.

¶ 1014. A brakeman assumes the risk of coupling and uncoupling cars at a cattle guard, such as exist at intervals over the entire road.—Fuller v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 108 Mich. 690.

¶ 1015. A railroad brakeman will be held to have assumed the risks incident to the use in lanterns of an inferior quality of oil furnished by the company employing him, where it appears that the oil had made him trouble for several weeks, and that he continued to use it without complaint.—Huffman v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 109 Mich. 251.

¶ 1016. A brakeman does not assume the risk of an unsafe place to work arising out of the faulty construction or lack of repair of a brick yard shed in which the railroad company maintains a siding.—Doyle v. Toledo, S. & M. R. Co., 127 Mich. 94.

¶ 1017. A brakeman and switchman who has assisted for eight days in making "flying switches," will be held to have assumed the risk of injury therefrom.—Carr v. St. Clair Tunnel Co., 131 Mich. 592.

¶ 1018. A railroad brakeman assumes the risk of injuries resulting from being caught by a hook placed on the end of a locomotive, used for switching, for the purpose of hanging the end of the air hose, notwithstanding protests on his part and frequent removal by him where the hook is shown to have been in general use by the company and to have been replaced whenever found missing.—Crawford v. Detroit, G. R. & W. R. Co., 127 Mich. 312.

¶ 1019. An experienced brakeman, who while running backwards with a car, fixing the coupling, fell into an open ditch covered with snow, by the side of the road-bed and was run over by such car and killed, assumed the risk; where it appeared that the ditch was an outlet for a drain underneath the switches, and had existed for many years and that the deceased must have known of the ditch as he had passed over it every day for a year without objection.—Miller v. Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 133 Mich. 564.

¶ 1020. A switchman cannot be said to assume the risk of all injuries sustained by riding on the side of a freight car.—Bradburn v. Wabash R. Co., 134 Mich. 575.

¶ 1021. A competent brakeman who had been in the employ of defendant company for over a year, and who sustained injury by the slipping of the platform of a car while he was engaged in coupling, did not assume the risk growing out of the construction of the car and platform in question.—Hewitt v. East Jordan Lumber Co., 136 Mich. 110.

¶ 1022. A railroad brakeman, who was crushed to death between a cattle chute and a passing car, assumed the risk of being injured, where he was familiar with the location of the cattle chute, and where, if he exercised ordinary care in the performance of his duties, he must have known that there was not sufficient space for him to pass between the chute and an ordinary freight car; even though he may not have known the precise distance by measurement.—Wilson v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 145 Mich. 509.

¶ 1023. In a suit by a switchman for personal injuries received in a fall over a pile of gravel which had been allowed to remain in defendant railway company's yard, defendant cannot make a good defense on the ground that plaintiff assumed the risk of falling over such obstruction.—Gillespie v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 150 Mich. 303.

¶ 1024. Where plaintiff, a brakeman, is injured by striking a cattle chute placed three feet, eleven inches from the side track of the railroad, and is ignorant of the location of the cattle chute, he cannot recover from the defendant railroad for the injury if, in the exercise of reasonable diligence, he should have known of the chute, so as to be held to have assumed the risk.—Carr v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 152 Mich. 138.

¶ 1025. A railroad brakeman who has through long experience become thoroughly acquainted with the fact that many side tracks in a particular locality are built upon "made ground," must be held to have assumed the risk, if any, arising from such construction.—Anderson v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 168 Mich. 207.

¶ 1026. Defendant railway's contract with its switchmen provided that the cutting off of passenger cars should be done by the car men, and prohibited the switchmen from performing such duty. Plaintiff's decedent, a switchman, was injured while cutting off a coach at the direction of the yard conductor. The accident occurred through the negligence of a fellow-switchman in making another coupling so as to force the cars together between which the decedent was working. Held, plaintiff was not precluded from recovery because of the fellow-servant rule.—Baker v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 169 Mich. 609.

§ 57b. ——Engineers and firemen.

¶ 1027. Whether an accident occasioned by a misplaced switch, by which a train is run on a side track and against cars standing there, is not within the risks assumed by an engineer in entering into the employment of the company to run its engines, quære.—Lyon v. Detroit, L. & L. M. R. Co., 31 Mich. 429.

¶ 1028. The defendant corporation was not liable for the death by accident of plaintiff's intestate, where the evidence showed that while engaged for defendant in the work of building a slip in a river, deceased in pushing off a scow on which the crew was working, from a pile driver, pushed his spike pole into some timbers, the pole slipped, and deceased, losing his balance, fell into the river and was drowned; since the risks of his employment were not concealed, but open and visible.—Fisher v. Chicago & Grand Trunk Ry. Co., 77 Mich. 546.

¶ 1029. A railroad engineer who has been over a particular crossing 161 times during the preceding year must be held to have assumed the risk of faulty signals at such crossing.—Mellish v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 167 Mich. 86.

¶ 1030. An experienced engineer who was killed by the derailment of his train, assumed the risk of defective castings in the engine, where it appeared that the engine had been properly constructed and that the defendant had performed its full duty as to inspection; that it was the decedent's duty to inspect the engine and that he made such inspection but reported nothing wrong, and where the defect, if any, was easily discernible.—Peppett v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 119 Mich. 640.

¶ 1031. An engineer of a passenger train who was injured in a wreck did not assume the risk of an unsafe track, as it was the duty of the master to be diligent in maintaining the track.—Hamilton v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 135 Mich. 95.

¶ 1032. A locomotive fireman who has been employed on the same engine for several months, and is required, in the course of his duties, to go out several times on a running board on each trip so that he comes into frequent contact with the guard rail above the running board, assumes the risk of the turning of the hand rail as he catches hold of it upon his way back from the head of the engine where he has shut the door of the headlight.—Gillette v. Grand Trunk Western Ry. Co., 192 Mich. 113.

¶ 1033. A locomotive fireman who has worked daily on the same locomotive engine for several months and is required, in the course of his duties, to pass daily over the running boards of the engine, assumes the risk in passing a rope used to fasten the bail of a classification lamp to the upper rail along the running board, which is hanging so as to form a loop, where the rope had been in use for some time, was in plain view, and he was hurt in broad daylight while on his return from the head of the engine where he had shut the door of the headlight.—Gillette v. Grand Trunk Western Ry. Co., 192 Mich. 113.

§ 57c. ——Employees of street railways.

¶ 1034. A motorman who had had proper instruction, had been employed by a street car company for six months, who knew the purposes for which sand was used and was familiar with sand boxes, and the effect of sand upon a slippery track must be assumed to have assumed the risk occasioned when he failed to use sand and a shovel provided on the car, and the car ran away because of the slippery condition of the track.—Mayer v. Detroit, Y., A. A. & J. Ry., 142 Mich. 459.

¶ 1035. A motorman on an electric street railway who was injured through a collision of his car with another car which was backing up, and who as an employee knew that cars had been backed on the piece of road in question and that it was likely to happen again; that the cars did not carry red lanterns upon the rear as was customary with steam railroads, and what if any means there were of determining whether a car was approaching or going away from him; assumed the risk of the methods adopted by the employer in relation to the backing of such cars.—Seccombe v. Detroit Elec. Ry., 133 Mich. 170.

¶ 1036. Where a motorman for an electric railway was familiar with the system of transmitting power and knew that a high tension wire was near enough so that it might be reached by a trolley pole from the top of a car and that contact with such wire was dangerous, no recovery can be had for his death resulting from contact with the wire by a defective trolley pole which was being removed from the car, since he assumed the risk though no specific instructions had been given him as to the danger from such contact if the trolley pole was removed from the car in a certain manner.—Harrison v. Detroit, Y., A. A. & J. Ry. Co., 137 Mich. 78.

¶ 1037. A suburban street railway employee engaged in construction work, who sustained injury as the result of a car of his company on which he was being transported running into an open unguarded switch which had no light, target or lock, did not assume the risk of such appliances, as his work was performed at a distance from the switch in question and no notice of the defects would have come to him through his work and his duties had no relation to the track.—Noe v. Rapid Ry. Co., 133 Mich. 152.

¶ 1038. A plaintiff conductor did not assume the risk of an injury received through a fall while descending from the top of an electric car, because a step provided for the purpose of aiding in ascending and descending from the top of the car was not in place, since the risks assumed in such a case are those usually incident to the employment.—Leary v. Houghton County Traction Co., 171 Mich. 365.

§ 58. Under Federal Employers' Liability Act.

Liability of employer under Federal Employers' Liability Act, see also ante § 37.
Sufficiency of proofs, see post § 66.

¶ 1039. The doctrine of assumption of risk, except such as arise from a carrier's violation of a statute enacted for the safety of its employees, is available to the defendant in an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.—Miller v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 185 Mich. 432.

¶ 1040. The Federal Employers' Liability Act, 35 U. S. Stat. 65, takes away the defense of fellow-servant's negligence, and under it contributory negligence does not bar, the action being available only in mitigation of damages in proportion to the employee's negligence.—Gaines v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 193 Mich. 398.

¶ 1041. The defense of the assumption of risk of injury from being caught between the side of a car and the track doors leading into a freight shed, held open to the defendant in an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, for injury sustained from such cause by an employee.—Miller v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 185 Mich. 432.

¶ 1042. In order to make the negligence of a fellow-servant one of the assumed risks under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, the injured employee must actually know of the fact of the negligence of his fellow-servant, or such negligence must be so customary that he would be chargeable with knowledge thereof.—Chapman v. United States Exp. Co., 192 Mich. 654.

¶ 1043. Under the Federal Employers' Liability Act an employee assumes the usual and ordinary risk incident to his employment.—Chapman v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 196 Mich. 671.

¶ 1044. The defense of assumption of risk is available in actions brought under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, 35 U. S. Stat. 65, except in cases where defendant has violated a statute enacted for the safety of employees, and where such violation contributed to the injury.—Gaines v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 193 Mich. 398.

¶ 1045. Under the Federal Employers' Liability Act the defense of assumed risk remains as at common law.—Simms v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. Ry. Co., 196 Mich. 114.

Risks assumed under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, see note, 8 N. C. C. A. 834-871.

G. CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Burden of proof as to contributory negligence, see post § 62b.

General law of contributory negligence, see Negligence, IV.
Under Workmen's Compensation Act, see Workmen's Compensation Act.
Contributory negligence of workman as passenger, see Carriers, IV, E, 7.

¶ 1046. In determining the question of the contributory negligence of an operator whose duty lies in the line of danger, all of the circumstances must be considered, and particularly those exigencies which render the prompt performance of his duty necessary.—Irvine v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 89 Mich. 416.

¶ 1047. In determining whether a deceased employee was guilty of contributory negligence, the jury is bound to consider all the facts and circumstances bearing upon that question, and cannot select one particular prominent fact or circumstance as controlling the case to the exclusion of all the others.—Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Ives, 144 U. S. 408, 36 L. ed. 485, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 679.

¶ 1048. The age and intelligence of a laborer injured by machinery, and his experience in the use of such machinery, may be considered by the jury in an action by him for the injury.—Huizega v. Cutler & Savidge Lumber Co., 51 Mich. 272.

§ 59a. Statutory provisions.

¶ 1049. Act No. 104, § 2, Pub. Acts, 1909, providing that contributory negligence of an employee of a common carrier railroad does not bar recovery if of a lesser degree than that of the carrier, its officers, agents or employees, does not declare the common law relating to gross negligence and ordinary negligence, but means that the employee may recover if his negligence is less than that of the company.—Bruce v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 172 Mich. 441.

¶ 1050. Under Act No. 104, § 2, Pub. Acts, 1909, providing that contributory negligence of an employee of a common carrier railroad does not bar recovery if of a lesser degree than that of the carrier and that no injured employee can be held guilty of contributory negligence or to have assumed the risk of his employment where the violation by the carrier of a statute for the safety of employees contributes to the injury, the defenses of assumed risk and contributory negligence are not available where a violation of such a statute contributes to the injury or if the negligence of the employee is less than that of the company, its agents, officers or employees.—Bruce v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 172 Mich. 441.

¶ 1051. Act No. 104, § 2, Pub. Acts, 1909, providing that contributory negligence of employees of common carrier railroads does not bar recovery if the negligence of the employee is of lesser degree than that of the carrier, nor where the violation by the carrier of a statute for the safety of employees contributes to the injury, must be construed to give effect to the legislative intention which is found in the act itself and the conditions which the legislature thereby sought to remedy.—Sonsmith v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 173 Mich. 57.

¶ 1052. The language in Act No. 104, Pub. Acts, 1909, providing that common carrier railroads are liable for injuries caused by the negligence of the carrier, its officers, agents or employees, and contributory negligence does not bar recovery if the negligence is of a lesser degree than that of the carrier and that contracts of employment, etc., are no defense to actions for injuries, is not ambiguous and the classification is not clearly arbitrary.—Sonsmith v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 173 Mich. 57.

¶ 1053. Under Act No. 104, § 2, Pub. Acts, 1909, providing that where employees of common carrier railroads are injured negligence contributing to the injury does not bar recovery if such negligence is of a lesser degree than that of the company, the courts still have the power to determine whether there is actionable negligence attributable to the company and whether there is testimony tending to show mutual fault in proximate relation to the injury, but the terms, slight, ordinary and gross negligence afford no proper basis for reaching the determination, and the question in all cases of mutual fault will be "whether the fault of the defendant was the greater."—Sonsmith v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 173 Mich. 57.

¶ 1054. Act No. 104, Pub. Acts, 1909, relating to the liability of common carrier railroads for injuries caused by negligence of the company, its officers, agents or employees, or by contributory negligence, and providing that contracts of employment, etc., are no defense to actions for injuries, is not amendatory of any other statute, but it alters the common law as to the single class of employees and employers mentioned.—Sonsmith v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 173 Mich. 57.

§ 59b. Omission of statutory duty by master.

Statutory provisions and regulations, see ante §§ 35, 36.

Provisions as to protecting and safeguarding machinery and places, see ante § 51.

Duty to inspect and repair, see ante § 53.

Duty to warn and instruct, see ante § 54.

¶ 1055. The rule depriving an employer of the defense of assumption of risk where he has omitted a statutory duty in safeguarding dangerous places to work does not extend to the defense of contributory negligence because the assumption of risk may be a defense in cases where there is no contributory negligence.—Swick v. Aetna Portland Cement Co., 147 Mich. 454, per Hooker and Carpenter, JJ., others concurring in the result.

¶ 1056. An omission of a statutory duty to safeguard machines does not deprive an employer of the defense of contributory negligence.—Schulte v. Pfaudler Co., 150 Mich. 427.

¶ 1057. Where a defendant fails to provide a loose pulley upon which to shift the belt of a machine, in violation of a statute requiring such pulley, plaintiff is nevertheless prevented by contributory negligence from recovery for an injury suffered in an attempt to tie up the loose belt from the shafting.—Trombley v. McAfee, 152 Mich. 494.

¶ 1058. Elimination from the case of the doctrine of the assumption of risk, because the risk arose through omission to guard belting as required by statute, does not carry with it the defense of contributory negligence in failing to be careful about coming in contact with such belt so exposed.—Swick v. Aetna Portland Cement Co., 147 Mich. 454, per Hooker and Carpenter, JJ., others concurring in the result.

¶ 1059. A brakeman is not guilty of negligence contributing to his injury where his own acts are not negligently performed though he continues in the service after knowledge of the incompetency of a conductor because of habitual intemperance, where a statute (Comp. L., § 6284) provides that no person who uses intoxicating drinks as a beverage shall be employed in any operating department of a railroad.—Wallin v. Arcadia & B. River Ry. Co., 172 Mich. 466.

§ 59c. Reliance on due performance of duty by master.

Care and diligence required of master, see ante § 33.

Duty to protect and safeguard machinery and places, see ante § 51.

Assumption of risk from nonperformance of duty by master, see ante § 56f.

Omission of statutory duty by master as bearing on contributory negligence, see ante § 59b.

¶ 1060. A servant has a right to trust the prudence and caution of his employer, and to rely upon his not putting him in charge of implements which, from improper construction or other cause, are so dangerous that a prudent man would not make use of them.—Fort Wayne, J. & S. R. Co. v. Gildersleeve, 33 Mich. 133.

¶ 1061. An employee is not bound, before beginning work, to familiarize himself with the condition of all the machinery he may come in contact with. It is enough if he knows his own work and the risks directly connected with it.—Swoboda v. Ward, 40 Mich. 420.

¶ 1063. A servant is not negligent in presuming that his master has performed his duty.—Irvine v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 89 Mich. 416.

¶ 1064. The servant has a right to presume that his safety has been reasonably provided for, and in a general way use a walk or appliance without first particularly inspecting it.—Kaukola v. Oliver Iron Mining Co., 159 Mich. 689.

¶ 1065. An employee going on a skip of a mining shaft has the right to assume that all needed help was being employed in the engine house, so that he may with perfect safety go onto the skip, or, in lieu of such help, that all proper rules and regulations for the safe conduct of the work had been made and promulgated.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1066. An employee in a mine has the right to assume that the defendant employer has done all things, including the making and promulgation of adequate rules, necessary to secure his safety in going onto the skip to assist in loading heavy machinery thereon.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1067. A brakeman's duty to test brakes to see that they work properly does not require him to look for defects in the brake-chain which are not apparent except upon a careful examination, link by link, and his failure to discover such defects is not contributory negligence.—Morton v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co., 81 Mich. 423.

¶ 1068. A person when employed and instructed to commence work at a particular place is under no obligation in order to protect himself from the charge of contributory negligence, to first go over the building or plant and make himself familiar with each piece of machinery, and the danger he may incur in case he comes in contact with it in its then condition.—Boman v. Mashek Chemical & Iron Co., 147 Mich. 178.

¶ 1069. A brakeman who was killed while going between cars to set brakes is not guilty of contributory negligence in having failed to examine the cars to see if his way was clear and safe before it became necessary to brake the cars, where it was shown that the cars were improperly loaded and he did not have time to examine whether they were properly loaded.—Irvine v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 89 Mich. 416.

¶ 1070. With respect to the employer's duty to supply a safe place to work, the servant will not be bound to familiarize himself with all the machinery or appliances which he does not himself use.—Kaukola v. Oliver Iron Mining Co., 159 Mich. 689.

§ 59d. Reliance on assurances of safety or promise to repair.

Duty of master to inspect and repair, see ante § 58.

Reliance on assurance of safety or promise to repair as bearing on assumption of risk, see ante § 56h.

Questions of law and fact, see post § 68c.

¶ 1071. It is the duty of a section hand who knows that his work of cleaning switches during a snow storm is more or less hazardous, owing to the frequent operation of trains, to exercise reasonable care to protect himself from injury.—Barnhart v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 188 Mich. 587.

¶ 1072. It is not contributory negligence for an employee who is in doubt about the safety of the place where he has to work to defer to the opinions and assurances of those who are supposed to know, and from their position are bound to have special knowledge, as to whether it is safe or not.—Lake Superior Iron Co. v. Erickson, 39 Mich. 492.

¶ 1073. Where a motorman suggested the use of sand to avoid the danger of his car slipping on a certain grade, and the superintendent assured him that the track was safe without it, the plaintiff is justified in relying upon such assurance.—Mayer v. Detroit, Y., A. A. & J. Ry., 152 Mich. 276.

¶ 1074. A statement or assurance of the safety of a place when given an employee will not be deemed to have been made in a representative capacity, unless given by a vice principal.—Lesh v. Tamarack Min. Co., 186 Mich. 399.

¶ 1075. One who is employed upon a farm to blast stumps, and is experienced in the use of dynamite and the effect of explosions in blasting stumps, and has equal knowledge with the general superintendent of the farm how the electrical appliances are used in firing the shots and the length of the electric wire used, and uses an unusually heavy charge in firing a shot, and fails to seek protection from flying pieces by retiring to a safe place, cannot recover on the bare assurances of the general superintendent that the wire was of sufficient length and reasonably safe if properly used.—Gatewood v. Consolidated Coal Co., 192 Mich. 247.

¶ 1076. A servant who calls attention to the fact that dangerous machinery has become uncovered, and who continues work in obedience to orders and relying on assurances that the defect shall be remedied, is not guilty of contributory negligence.—Roux v. Blodgett & Davis Lumber Co., 85 Mich. 519.

¶ 1077. An employee who continues for a reasonable time in the use of defective machinery, under the promise of repair, cannot be said, as a matter of law, to have been reckless.—Krohn v. Joseph N. Smith & Co., 151 Mich. 247.

§ 59e. Avoidance of or precautions against known or apparent dangers.

Duty to provide safe tools, appliances and places, see ante § 46 et seq.

Assumption of risks from known obvious or apparent dangers, see ante § 56b.

¶ 1078. For an injury received by a workman who catches his hand in the exposed cogs of an ordinary planing machine the master is not liable, where it appears that although such workman had run the machine only a day or two, he had worked within a few feet of it for two years or more, and among similar machinery for twenty-five years; since the danger of accident was perfectly apparent, and could have been easily avoided.—Schroeder v. Michigan Car Co., 56 Mich. 132.

¶ 1079. A fairly intelligent youth of sixteen had his hand mutilated by the jointer in a planing mill where for two weeks he had been at work. He had had no previous experience with such machinery, but the dangerous nature of the jointer was manifest to any one who looked at it, and he would not have been hurt if he had not laid his hand, without looking, upon the table in which the jointer operated. Held, that the injury was accidental, and he could not recover for it.—Palmer v. Harrison, 57 Mich. 182.

¶ 1080. An employee operating an elevator is guilty of contributory negligence if, knowing that unless the brake is properly set and locked a weight placed upon it will cause it to descend, he rolls heavy weights thereon without first seeing that it is properly set.—Robinson v. Charles Wright & Co., 94 Mich. 283.

¶ 1081. An employee injured by the sudden release of an elevator alleged to have been due to a defective spring, cannot recover therefor where he had used the elevator constantly for many months and was the last one to use it before the accident, the mechanism being simple and in plain view so that by the exercise of ordinary care he would have seen any defect which might exist.—Juchatz v. Michigan Alkali Co., 120 Mich. 654.

¶ 1082. Plaintiff's intestate was employed as a fireman on a derrick located on a dock. He went below the deck of the derrick for the apparent purpose of loosening bolts in a steam engine, to let the water out for the night. The machinery below was unprotected by guards and the intestate was caught therein and killed. The place was not one where the workmen usually worked, and was known to plaintiff as a place of peril. Held, he was contributorily negligent and no recovery could be had.—Gehl v. Pittsburg Coal Co., 163 Mich. 285.

¶ 1083. An oiler was guilty of contributory negligence, who had been engaged in oiling machinery in defendant's factory daily for about seven months and knew or was chargeable with notice that the band saw in question against which he put his hand was there, and where the saw was not dangerously near the place where such oiler was called to do the oiling, but was more than three feet away, and the least care would have prevented his putting his hand near the saw.—Perlick v. Detroit Wooden-Ware Co., 119 Mich. 331.

¶ 1084. Plaintiff was a mature and intelligent man set to work to unload a car of frozen sawdust into a hopper in a platform from which ran a conveyor. There was behind him an uncovered elevator casing which plaintiff claims he did not see but of which the foreman warned him, and while he was attempting to dodge and step back from a piece of frozen sawdust which was about to fall on him he fell into the conveyor and was severely injured. Held, that the defendant could not escape liability on the theory of contributory negligence in that the plaintiff having developed the situation from or out of which the accident happened he was bound to see that there was a safe way to escape from the position of danger created by himself and to escape by any other way at his peril.—Roman v. Mashek Chemical Co., 147 Mich. 178.

¶ 1085. Although a plaintiff suing for personal injuries had been employed in violation of Pub. Acts 1901, Act No. 113, § 3, which recognizes the immaturity of judgment of children under 16, he cannot recover for an injury received through thrusting his hand into a planer head on the mistaken supposition that it was not running, where he knew at the time everything that the most experienced person could have told him of the danger of doing so.—Beghold v. Auto Body Co., 149 Mich. 14.

§ 59f. ——Working on or about tracks or trains.

Proximate cause of accident to railroad employees, see ante § 43.

Safety and sufficiency of tracks and other railroad equipment, see ante § 49.

Methods of operating and unloading trains, see ante § 52a.

Fellow-servant rule as applied to railroad employees, see ante § 55j.

Assumption of risk by railroad employees, see ante § 57.
Dangerous methods of work, see post § 59i.
Disregard of rules, warnings and instructions, see post § 59m.
Jury questions as to contributory negligence, see post § 68f.

¶ 1086. A brakeman, whose business it also was to couple cars, had his arm crushed in trying to couple to another car a caboose the drawbar of which was some six inches below that of the other car and of cars generally. The caboose had been in that condition for a month, as the brakeman himself knew, and it had been reported for repairs; but the fact that the drawbars were not on the same level must have been apparent to any one attempting to couple the cars, if he used his eyes. Held, that he could not recover against the railroad company.—Brewer v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 56 Mich. 620.

¶ 1087. A railroad employee was injured by a defective draw-head which he used for the first time without looking at it, acting on the supposition that it was all right. He had worked about the engine nearly a week without examining the draw-head, which he was liable to use at any moment. Held, that his negligence would prevent a recovery for the injury.—Goulin v. Canada South. Bridge Co., 64 Mich. 190.

¶ 1088. Where the immediate cause of a switchman's being thrown from an engine was a violent jerk resulting from the sudden reversal of the engine without warning, it was held that his knowledge of the want of a hand-rail to assist him in keeping his place on the step at the end of the tender of the engine did not render him guilty of contributory negligence.—Lyttle v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 84 Mich. 289.

¶ 1089. An employee who, knowing the fractious disposition of a horse, drives him within five feet of a backing engine from which steam is escaping, is guilty of such contributory negligence as will preclude a recovery for injuries sustained by reason of the unmanageableness of the horse, though he expressly objected to driving it.—Mahan v. Clee, 87 Mich. 161.

¶ 1090. A brakeman who, while trying in the daytime to uncouple from an engine a moving freight car, is injured by stepping into an unfilled space between the ties of a side track, cannot recover where the condition of the track was or should have been known to him, he having frequently passed it in the discharge of his duties, and where, relying upon his supposition that the road was smooth, he stepped upon it without looking at the obvious defect.—Ragon v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co., 97 Mich. 265.

¶ 1091. A brakeman cannot recover for injuries sustained by reason of a defective drawbar while attempting to make a coupling, where he discovered the danger when the cars were several rods apart, walked along trying to block it up, though he might, by stopping the train and adjusting the bar, or by raising it in another way than that attempted, have avoided the injury.—Secord v. Chicago & M. L. S. R. Co., 107 Mich. 540.

¶ 1092. A section hand injured by an engine backing over a street crossing which he was cleaning, is guilty of contributory negligence which precludes recovery where, after seeing the engine and knowing that it might come that way, he resumed work with his back toward it without looking though an occasional glance would have informed him of its approach.—Carlson v. Cincinnati S. & M. R. Co., 120 Mich. 481.

¶ 1093. A railroad employee who while walking beside and pushing a car by a hand rail along a track-siding in the railroad yard on a moonlight night, walks up to and strikes against a coal shed near the track when he should have seen it, is guilty of contributory negligence.—Pahlan v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 122 Mich. 232.

¶ 1094. A brakeman who while in charge of a car in defendant's yard in the daytime, without looking to see if the way was clear, climbed upon a ladder at the side of his car which was moving toward a pile of lumber a few feet away, from which boards projected, is guilty of contributory negligence and cannot recover for an injury sustained by his being struck by the boards.—Ramsay v. C. K. Eddy & Sons, 123 Mich. 158.

¶ 1095. A brakeman who was injured while changing a lever so as to shift a semaphore signal and turn a switch, was not entitled to recover where the accident could have been avoided had he put his foot, his knee, or his hand upon the top of the lever before withdrawing the pin; as such action would have prevented the lever flying up and striking him and the appliance was reasonably safe.—Chapman v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 133 Mich. 311.

¶ 1096. Where a side track in a freight yard was constructed with a very sharp curve, so that there was great danger that in coupling cars the draw-bars would slip and pass each other, which danger, however, existed only on the inside of the curve, it was held to be contributory negligence for an experienced brakeman, who must have been aware of the danger, to remain on the inside while engaged in coupling.—Tuttle v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 122 U. S. 189, 30 L. ed. 1114, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1166.

¶ 1097. A compliance with the statutory duty of stopping and giving signals before passing a crossing of two railroads does not relieve an engineer from the duty of keeping his train under control when he knows that there are no semaphores, flag-men or gates at the crossing; and where both engineers of colliding trains are negligent in this respect, neither, if injured, can recover from the other's employer.—Kelly v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co., 92 Mich. 19.

¶ 1098. A foreman of a railroad section gang who, while inspecting his section, runs a considerable distance along the track on a tricycle without looking back, although he knows that extra trains may come at any time, is guilty of contributory negligence.—Jolly v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 93 Mich. 370.

¶ 1099. A railroad company employing a flagman is not responsible for his death through being run over by one train while he was flagging another, when he could have seen such train by simply turning his head and the trainmen did not see him. The company owes no duty to protect the flagman by notifying him of the approach of trains. It is his duty to watch for passing trains.—Zulke v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 147 Mich. 192.

¶ 1100. A section hand who knows the company's custom of shunting cars along the tracks in its yard in making up trains, and who also knows that cars have just been run unattended upon the side track where he is at work, is guilty of such contributory negligence as bars recovery, if, failing to look out for moving cars, he is injured.—Schaible v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 97 Mich. 318.

¶ 1101. The danger of riding on the side of the tender of an engine through a roundhouse door, with a clearance of from eleven to sixteen inches only, is an obvious one.—Hollingshead v. Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 181 Mich. 547.

¶ 1102. A repairer of tracks employed in a railroad company's yard, which as he well knew was used for the purpose of making up trains, was held guilty of contributory negligence for placing himself with his face away from the direction from which cars were to be expected, and for continuing his work without looking back, in consequence of which he was struck and injured by a slowly-moving switch-engine.—Aerkfetz v. Humphreys, 145 U. S. 418, 36 L. ed. 758, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 885.

¶ 1103. The engineer of a switch-engine in a railroad yard used for the purpose of moving cars has a right to act on the belief that employees in the yard, familiar with the continuously recurring movement of the cars, will take reasonable precaution against their approach, especially where the cars are moving so slowly that ordinary attention on an employee's part would enable him to avoid them.—Aerkfetz v. Humphreys, 145 U. S. 418, 36 L. ed. 758, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 885.

¶ 1104. A brakeman of a railroad owes a duty to the company to familiarize himself with the location of buildings along the track, so as to avoid injury.—Carr v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 152 Mich. 138.

¶ 1105. It is the duty of an engineer to know the duties of a station agent along the line of the railroad so far as they relate to the proper discharge of the engineer's duty and failure to inform himself of such matters may constitute negligence on his part.—Hewitt v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 67 Mich. 61.

¶ 1106. A plaintiff brakeman riding on the top of defendant's freight car in the discharge of his duties, owes only a duty of reasonable observation of his surroundings in the light of experience, and is not required to anticipate that wires would be strung over the track at a height in violation of law.—Meyers v. Detroit & C. R. Co., 166 Mich. 408.

§ 59g. ——Mining.

Proximate cause of accident to miner, see ante § 43.

Safety of miner and mining equipment, see ante § 50.

Mine employees as fellow-servants, see ante § 55p.

Assumption of risk by mine employees, see ante § 56n.

Jury questions as to contributory negligence of mine employees, see post § 68e.

¶ 1107. Whether a plaintiff employee in a mine should be held to be charged with knowledge of a chute into which he fell and was injured, depends on whether such chute would or would not escape ordinarily careful observation.—Kaukola v. Oliver Iron Mining Co., 159 Mich. 689.

¶ 1108. Where a plaintiff miner proceeds to timber the roof of a raise some hours after blasting, and knows the increased danger of such delay, or if as a reasonable person he should have known of it, he cannot recover of defendant employer for an injury to him from the falling of ore from said roof.—Hoaking v. Cleveland Iron Mining Co., 163 Mich. 538.

¶ 1109. Where a miner experienced in the use of dynamite prepares a number of blasts, lights them, goes away to a place of safety, counts the explosions, assumes that all of his charges have exploded, returns and is injured by an explosion of a remaining charge, he is guilty of such negligence as bars his recovery.—Snarski v. Montreal Mining Co., 176 Mich. 698.

¶ 1110. For a miner on being suddenly confronted by a moving car in a narrow passage of a mine, to step in his excitement to the side where he came into contact with an exposed electric wire instead of choosing the opposite side where he could have stood in safety, is not contributory negligence as a matter of law.—Hazzard v. Consolidated Coal Co., 133 Mich. 368.

§ 59h. Improper use of appliances and dangerous methods of work.

Methods of work, see ante § 52.
Assumption of risk from dangerous methods of work, see ante § 56k.
Avoidance of known or apparent dangers, see ante § 59e.

¶ 1111. Where an instrumentality furnished by the master is safe when properly handled the servant cannot handle it improperly and then recover damages for injuries received by him as the result.—Alford v. Metcalf Brothers & Co., 74 Mich. 369.

¶ 1112. An operator is guilty of contributory negligence if, where it is dangerous to remove, while a saw is in motion, the refuse accumulating around a lath machine, he fails to stop the saw though able to do so, and goes on with such removal.—Torongo v. Salliotte, 99 Mich. 41.

¶ 1113. Where the servant may perform his work in two ways, one safe, the other dangerous, the master is not responsible for injuries to him where he voluntarily assumes the dangerous way.—Kopf v. Monroe Stone Co., 133 Mich. 286.

¶ 1114. Where two methods are open for the performance of a duty, one dangerous and the other safe for the operator, one who chooses the dangerous method rather than the safe will be precluded from recovery.—Lukovski v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 164 Mich. 361.

¶ 1115. It is contributory negligence to reach over a revolving circular saw to take a piece of lumber in such a way that a slip or the cessation of pressure would throw one's arm against the saw.—Lindstrand v. Delta Lumber Co., 65 Mich. 254.

¶ 1116. A laborer in a saw-mill who undertakes to saw a piece of scantling by leaning over the saw with one arm stretched across it, so that, if he slips, the destruction of his arm is inevitable, is guilty of contributory negligence.—Lindstrand v. Delta Lumber Co., 65 Mich. 254; Lindstrand v. Delta Lumber Co., 68 Mich. 261.

¶ 1117. It is contributory negligence for the operator of a circular saw to reach over and place his body in a line of danger where the machine was likely to throw boards, and did throw the one which hurt him, where the object of so reaching was to grasp a lever used for freeing the machine when it clogged and he was familiar with it and might have adapted the location of the lever to his short stature by means of a rope as was customarily done before or might have walked around the machine and stopped it by means of a lever on the other side, but instead of doing either was hasty and forgetful of the danger.—Dutchowski v. Handy Things Co., 141 Mich. 11.

¶ 1118. It is contributory negligence for a servant to attempt to clean out the space between a guide and a saw by pushing with a lath which breaks and throws his hands against the saw.—Deering v. Canfield & Wheeler Co., 126 Mich. 373.

¶ 1119. Where an employee for the purpose of permitting a door to be raised higher, climbed upon the roof of a building to remove a plank, placed to protect the building and those working within from the falling of heavy weights placed above the building and used in raising and lowering a door, he was found guilty of contributory negligence, and his administratrix cannot recover where he was killed by the breaking of a cable and the falling of one of the weights; the employer is under no obligation to inspect where there is no reason to believe that his employees will interfere with the apparatus so as to make it dangerous.—Schwandt v. William Wright Co., 126 Mich. 609.

¶ 1120. Where defendant has provided two safe ways by which its employees may reach certain machinery which they are accustomed to use in their work, and plaintiff, one of such employees, chooses a third way, by means of a ladder, and on account of a defect in such ladder falls and is injured, plaintiff is not entitled to recover.—Perry v. Michigan Alkali Co., 150 Mich. 587.

¶ 1121. Where an employee sues his employer for personal injuries sustained by having his arm caught in the cogs of a machine which he was cleaning, he cannot recover if it appears that the work he was doing at the time of the accident did not require him to put any part of his person in dangerous proximity to the cogwheel, and that the accident would not have happened if plaintiff had conducted himself as an ordinarily prudent man should have done.—Schulte v. Pfaudler Co., 150 Mich. 427.

¶ 1122. An experienced workman, familiar with ropes and their use, who selects a rope from a pile of ropes at hand, knowing for what purpose it is to be used, cannot recover for injury resulting from the breaking of the rope.—Cronin v. Russel Wheel & Foundry Co., 132 Mich. 500.

¶ 1123. Plaintiff was employed by the defendant in the manufacture of paper boxes at a machine called a "stayer machine," used to fasten a gummed tape upon the corners of boxes. The gummed tape was automatically fed by the machine towards the front thereof, and towards the operator. A hammer operated by a foot lever came down upon an anvil so as to press the moistened tape upon the corner of the box. Pincers were supplied with the machine to be used when necessary in pulling out the tape. Plaintiff while using said pincers stuck her other hand into the machine and under said hammer and a knife used to cut off said tape, said knife being operated by said foot lever. While so engaged her finger was injured by the hammer and knife which had been released by her by putting her foot on said foot lever. Plaintiff understood thoroughly the operation and the dangers of the machine. Held, she was precluded from recovering, by contributory negligence.—Woods v. Kalamazoo Paper Box Co., 167 Mich. 514.

¶ 1124. Where appliances are suitable and in proper condition for the purpose for which they are intended, the master is not liable in damages to an employee who is injured while unnecessarily using them for some other purpose. So held where a miner, while ascending from the mine in a cage constructed for that purpose, was injured by using as a hand-hold part of the apparatus provided for hoisting the cage from the mine.—Jayne v. Sebewaing Coal Co., 108 Mich. 242.

§ 59i. ——Boarding or working about trains or tracks.

Proximate cause of accident to railroad employee, see ante § 43.
Methods of operating and unloading trains, see ante § 52a.
Assumption of risk by railroad employees, see ante § 57.
Avoidance of known or apparent dangers, see ante § 59f.
Jury questions as to contributory negligence, see post § 68f et seq.

¶ 1125. A call "All aboard!" when work cars are about leaving is no more than notice of that fact, and does not justify a servant in boarding or leaving cars in motion.—Novock v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 63 Mich. 121.

¶ 1126. An employee of a car-building company crawled under some new cars which had been removed from the company's yards as completed, and placed upon defendant railroad company's track for transportation. The conductor of a train had already looked over the cars to see if any one was under them at work. The cars were then coupled to the train and were started up, and the employee was killed while completing some omitted part of construction pursuant to directions. Held, that he was guilty of contributory negligence.—Coops v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 66 Mich. 448.

¶ 1127. On a signal for brakes, a brakeman, standing on a flat-car in a freight train, caught hold of a ladder on the side of a box-car, and, swinging his body around to ascend, came in contact with a bridge, was thrown down and killed. Held, that he was guilty of contributory negligence.—Illick v. Flint & Pere Marquette R. Co., 67 Mich. 632.

¶ 1128. An experienced head-brakeman, whose hand was injured while he was coupling cars, was held to have been grossly careless, where, by his own testimony, it appeared that he was doing the switching of the train and was told to hitch on to a car at a station, and that while the train was moving backward, as required by his signal, he put the coupling pin in place, and noticing that the draw bar was defective, he attempted to raise the drawbar with his knee, but that it did not come up high enough and slipped and hurt his fingers; and that if he had looked around before the cars came together he could have stepped out from between the cars.—Karrer v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 76 Mich. 400.

¶ 1129. It is contributory negligence on the part of a switchman to ride in a sitting position upon the beam of the pilot of a road-engine, with his feet hanging down over the cowcatcher, and his personal representative is therefore precluded from recovery in a case where he was killed through the locomotive, on which he was riding, running into a truck owned by defendant and driven by this teamster.—Glover v. Scotten, 82 Mich. 369.

¶ 1130. One who undertakes to uncouple cars as they are passing over a "split switch," which he knows cannot be blocked, is guilty of negligence which precludes recovery for injury, whether the railroad company is or is not in fault for using such switch.—Grand v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 83 Mich. 564.

¶ 1131. A brakeman who rides in a standing position on the brakebeam of the tender of an ordinary road engine while backing across a river upon a trestle, at a rate of speed of from five to eight miles per hour, he having no place to hold to except the drawbar, against which he leans, and being in a position where he cannot see the engineer or fireman or be seen by either of them, is guilty of such negligence as will bar a recovery for injuries received by his being struck by the end of a gate which had become unfastened, and swung partly across the track, so as to come in contact with the rear end of the tender, and slide along, and crush the brakeman against the drawbar.—Benage v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 102 Mich. 72, aff'd on rehearing 102 Mich. 79.

¶ 1132. The contention made in an action to recover for injuries sustained by a brakeman being struck by a gate swung partly across the track, that the swinging in of the gate was not one of the dangers to be expected, and that the brakeman had the right to assume that the railroad company would discharge its duty, and not permit the gate to be unfastened or across the track at the time of the accident, as it was closed only at night and opened each morning, cannot be sustained, the brakeman being in a position where he could not escape injury if the tender backed into any other obstruction upon the track, and likely to be thrown off by any sudden starting of the engine; nor will it do to say, under these circumstances, that, because it was the custom of others to ride in the same exposed place, therefore the brakeman was in the exercise of due care.—Benage v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 102 Mich. 72, aff'd on rehearing 102 Mich. 79.

¶ 1133. The negligence of a brakeman, if any, in riding upon the pilot of an engine to the place where a coupling was to be made, cannot be said to have contributed to injuries sustained by him in consequence of the breaking of the pushbar while he was standing upon the crossbar of the pilot attempting to make the coupling, it appearing that it would have been necessary for him, in any event, to get upon the crossbar in order to perform such service.—McDonald v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 108 Mich. 7.

¶ 1134. Two cars coupled together had each a coupling lever. In uncoupling on one side the lever of one car was used, while in uncoupling on the other side, the lever of the other car must be used. Plaintiff, a brakeman, tried to operate one of the levers and could not, owing to its defective condition. Instead of trying the other lever, which was in good condition, he went between the cars to uncouple by hand and was injured. Held, he was barred from recovering by contributory negligence.—Wight v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 161 Mich. 216 (Moore, J. dissenting).

¶ 1135. It seems that a conductor who stands on the top of a car to hold the trolley on the wire while taking the car to the barn is guilty of contributory negligence.—Whitcomb v. Detroit Electric Ry., 125 Mich. 572.

¶ 1136. A foreman of a railroad section gang who, while inspecting his section, uses a tricycle instead of the hand-car which the company has provided for his safety, and who, in consequence of his going alone thereupon (which he was not required to do), is overtaken by a train and injured, cannot recover.—Jolly v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 93 Mich. 370.

¶ 1137. Plaintiff was a foreman in charge of defendant railway's coal dock. His duty was to oversee and assist in the coaling of the engines by means of large buckets, which were hoisted full of coal from the dock and dumped upon the tenders. While plaintiff was steadying with his hand one of the ascending buckets, the door at the bottom of the bucket jarred open and struck plaintiff's hand. A rope was attached to the bucket by which plaintiff might have guided and steadied it. Held, he could not recover, since he chose a dangerous method when a safe one was open to him.—Lukovski v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 164 Mich. 361.

¶ 1138. Plaintiff was employed in making up trains operated by defendant company, and for some three months had assisted in uncoupling air hose and engines, coupling safety chains, and similar work. He was injured by stepping between a coach and engine to close the jaw of a coupler so that it would be out of position to couple. From his own evidence it was shown that he was negligent in so doing. Held, that he was guilty of contributory negligence.—McCauley v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 167 Mich. 230.

¶ 1139. Where a car repairer goes between two freight cars in a switching yard, without any one else present to caution and protect him and without displaying warning signals or flags, according to the rules of the company, he assumes the risk and is guilty of contributory negligence.—Garlinghouse v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 174 Mich. 73.

¶ 1140. It is contributory negligence for an experienced employee of a coal company engaged in loading a car of not unusual width, to stand with knowledge of the danger, in a narrow space between the timbers of a coal tipple and the side of the car while removing a block from beneath its wheels in order to permit it to run down an incline.—Lewis v. Wolverine Coal Co., 186 Mich. 564.

§ 59j. Dangers not known or understood.

Assumption of risks from latent or unknown dangers, see ante § 56c.

¶ 1141. An employee who was injured by the fall of a rack suspended from the ceiling of the room in which he worked, was not guilty of contributory negligence in working near the rack, as it was not part of his duty to examine or use the rack, nor was it obviously dangerous to one working near it.—Corbett v. American Screen Door Co., 133 Mich. 669.

¶ 1142. A switchman is not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to get off the side of a car, to avoid a collision with a coal chute, where he testifies that he knew of the chute and was in the act of removing to the rear of the car when his foot was crushed by a pile of lumber some distance from the chute.—Bradburn v. Wabash R. Co., 134 Mich. 575.

¶ 1143. One who has no knowledge of the special dangers attending the handling of dynamite and fulminating caps, and who is not informed thereof by his employer, cannot be charged with contributory negligence that will prevent his recovering for injuries received.—Mather v. Rillson, 156 U. S. 391, 39 L. ed. 464, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 464.

¶ 1144. A brakeman who sustained injury by the shifting of a car platform while he was attempting to couple cars while on the inside of a curve, was not guilty of contributory negligence in getting on such inside of the curve, where no harm would have come to him had the platform not shifted.—Hewitt v. East Jordan Lumber Co., 136 Mich. 110.

¶ 1145. An employee who drank of the contents of a water cooler manufactured by defendant and furnished for the use of its employees, and was poisoned by an irritant poison which had been placed in such cooler for cleaning purposes, without notice to such employee, was not guilty of contributory negligence.—Geller v. Briscoe Mfg. Co., 136 Mich. 330.

§ 59k. Using defective tools, machinery or appliances.

Safety and sufficiency of tools and appliances, see ante § 46.
Duty of master to inspect and repair, see ante § 53.
Assumption of risk from master's negligence or nonperformance of duty, see ante § 56f.

¶ 1146. An employee who voluntarily remains in service in spite of defects in the machinery used and in the means employed to guard against accident, and without any promise by the employer to correct them, is guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover for any injury he may suffer in consequence.—Swoboda v. Ward, 40 Mich. 420.

¶ 1147. An employee informed of and understanding the dangerous character of machinery assumes the risk, and in remaining is guilty of such negligence as, notwithstanding the employer's negligence, will prevent his recovering for an injury.—King v. Ford River Lumber Co., 98 Mich. 172.

§ 59l. Disregard of rules, warnings or instructions.

Rules and orders, see ante § 52.
Warnings and instructions, see ante § 54.
Assumption of risks from violation of rules, orders and instructions, see ante § 56j.
Assumption of risk by railroad employees, see ante § 57.
Questions of law and fact, see post § 68f.

¶ 1148. There can be no recovery on account of a death which was caused by the decedent's own negligence in working, contrary to orders, a pump in a mine at the time men at the windlass are raising or lowering buckets.—Lendberg v. Brotherton Iron Min. Co., 97 Mich. 443.

¶ 1149. No recovery can be had against an employer for the death of a fourteen-year-old employee resulting from his coming in contact with an uncovered revolving shaft, where the deceased had no duties to perform with or about the shaft, and had been warned to keep away from it.—Monforton v. Detroit Pressed Brick Co., 113 Mich. 89.

¶ 1150. It is contributory negligence for a servant to go in the dark without a lantern on a narrow footway passing on the top of vats, some of them full of boiling liquid into which he fell, where condensing steam made the walk slippery, and where he had been told that he must be careful because of working over boiling hot liquids and had been instructed, though in broken English not perfectly understood, and had been working in the place for a week observing conditions.—Shippey v. Grand Rapids Leather Co., 124 Mich. 583.

¶ 1151. The mere presence of an employee in a doorway engaged in removing the door and obstructing it so that he had to be pushed aside, is not such warning to a fellow employee that a platform and stairway inside the door had been removed as to make him negligent as a matter of law in not heeding the warning.—Preuschoff v. B. Stroh Brewing Co., 132 Mich. 107.

¶ 1152. A driller in a stone quarry who sustained injury by an explosion resulting from his forcing dynamite into too small a hole in the rock in a stone quarry, and who in so doing acted at the request of the loader who was a coservant and outside the line of his duties, was, even on the assumption that he was engaged in loading holes, given sufficient notice of danger by being instructed by such loader how to do the work safely, and the employer would not have been bound to anticipate that the driller would attempt to force the dynamite into a hole too small.—Kopf v. Monroe Stone Co., 133 Mich. 286.

§ 59m. ——Operation of trains.

Avoidance of known or apparent dangers, see ante § 59f.
Dangerous methods of work, see ante § 59l.
Jury questions as to contributory negligence, see post § 68f et seq.

¶ 1153. If the conductor of a freight train is killed as the result of his failing to act upon a rule of the company, familiar to him, warning the operators of such trains to keep the latter under full control within station limits, in the expectancy to find the main track occupied, no recovery can be had in an action for damages for the death.—Enright v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co., 93 Mich. 409.

¶ 1154. A violation of rules of a railroad company, such as going between moving cars to uncouple them, is contributory negligence preventing recovery for injuries sustained unless the company has sanctioned the custom of its employees in acting in violation of the rules, so that they are abrogated.—Fluhrer v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 121 Mich. 212.

¶ 1155. An experienced brakeman got off of a train at a station, there being no necessity in the discharge of duty that he should do so, did not attempt to get on the train until it was in motion, passed several cars with side-ladders on without attempting to get aboard, and, while attempting to climb upon a car not belonging to his employer, pulled the hand-hold out of the wood, which had become rotten, so that he was dragged under the train. The master's rules forbade use of foreign cars without examining the ladders on them. Held, that he was guilty of contributory negligence.—Wilson v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 94 Mich. 20.

¶ 1156. An experienced brakeman, who, disregarding the company's rules and his contract of employment, unguardedly steps, for the purpose of reversing a crooked link so as to make a coupling, upon the track in front of a tender and engine that are approaching him "as fast as a fast walk," but the engineer and fireman of which are subject to his orders, and who, while walking sideways upon the track, trying to reverse the link, stumbles against a pile of ashes recently dumped upon the track from a passing engine and not observed by him, falls, and is injured, is guilty of such contributory negligence as precludes recovery.—Loranger v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 104 Mich. 80.

¶ 1158. In the case of injury from a rear end collision with a train standing at a station, the railroad company's failure to notify the engineer that the advance train stood on the track at the station would not render it liable to him for the injury, in view of a rule of the company requiring him driving a special to act on the supposition that another train would be met, or that the main track would be occupied at the station.—Whalen v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 114 Mich. 512.

¶ 1159. Violation of the master's rule against going between moving cars to couple them is not a defense against liability for resultant injury, where such violations by the servants are so customary, universal and notorious that the master may be deemed to have sanctioned an abrogation of the rule.—Fluhrer v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 124 Mich. 482.

¶ 1160. Recovery by a railroad employee injured while in a cinder pit, when it is alleged an engine was moved without ringing the bell, is not barred by failure to comply with a notice requiring car repairers and others of that department who work about cars to protect such cars with signals when performing work whereby a movement of the cars might result in injury, since such employee is not employed in the car department and is not a foreman.—Bruce v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 172 Mich. 441.

¶ 1161. Where the rules of a railroad company required car repairers to protect cars between which they were working with blue flags and lights, and there is no evidence that the company's officers knew of the violation of such rule, it is error to instruct the jury that if the rule had not been enforced, failure on the part of plaintiff to observe it would not affect his right of recovery.—Garlinghouse v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 174 Mich. 73.

¶ 1162. Where a brakeman has been cautioned against the danger of coupling cars loaded with logs, and where he has read a rule of the company forbidding coupling by hand, and calling attention to the fact that logs often project over the ends of cars, there can be no recovery if he is injured while coupling in that manner cars loaded with logs so projecting.—Brennan v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 98 Mich. 156.

¶ 1163. A switchman who had been strictly cautioned against having anything to do with coupling cars tried to uncouple some while the train was moving, and had his foot caught where the planking had been for some time slightly broken, though the defect had not been seen by him as yardman and the railroad company had no notice of it. Held, that he could not recover for the injury resulting to him.—Gardner v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 58 Mich. 584.

¶ 1164. An engineer who in running a railroad train is injured while disregarding the instructions which the company has issued for his guidance, and is therein guilty of gross negligence contributory to the injury, cannot recover damages of the company.—Lyon v. Detroit, L. & L. M. R. Co., 31 Mich. 429.

¶ 1165. Plaintiff's intestate, eighteen years old, was a member of defendant's extra section gang, and as such went from place to place with the construction train, and assisted in unloading material. A train of twenty flat cars had been unloaded, and was returning at the rate of from fifteen to twenty-five miles an hour. The men were riding upon the pilot of the engine, which was running backward, pulling the train. When about a mile distant from the place where the men were to alight, the conductor ordered them to go to the rear of the train, so as to be ready to drop off when the train should slack up for that purpose. The deceased started upon a run to obey the order, fell between the cars, and was killed. He had been in defendant's employ for about three months, and had been repeatedly cautioned by the foreman of the gang against running backward and forward over the cars while they were in motion. Held, that he was guilty of such negligence as to preclude a recovery for his death.—Saner v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 108 Mich. 31.

¶ 1166. An electric railway company is not liable for the death of an employee killed by coming in contact with a fuse block on a switchboard while his hand rested on an iron beam, where the testimony showed that he had been warned of the danger and the fuse block and wire pointed out to him.—Cron v. Toledo & Monroe Ry., 132 Mich. 497.

§ 59n. Compliance with orders or requests.

Assumption of risk from compliance with orders or commands, see ante § 561.

¶ 1167. A master cannot escape liability by insisting that his servant is in the wrong in not refusing to obey an unwarranted order within the scope of a supervisor's employment.—Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Bayfield, 37 Mich. 205.

¶ 1168. Where a servant in obeying his master's orders incurs the risk of machinery which it is reasonably probable may be safely used by extraordinary caution and skill, he is not guilty of concurring negligence.—Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Bayfield, 37 Mich. 205.

¶ 1169. An employee in an iron foundry was injured in consequence of the slipping of a fellow-workman on an icy path, over which they were carrying, under orders to do so, a ladle full of molten iron. Held, that the workmen should have been warned of the dangerous character of the service arising from the contact of water and ice with melted iron, and that without such warning they could not be charged with contributory negligence in not declining the service, or in not removing the ice before going upon it.—Smith v. Peninsular Car Works, 60 Mich. 501.

¶ 1170. A direction to a workman employed in loading slabs on a defective dump-car to fix it up as well as he can does not direct him to incure danger in using a circular saw to which he is not accustomed, nor, if it did, would it justify him in so doing, or in being careless in his use of the saw.—Lindstrand v. Delta Lumber Co., 65 Mich. 254; Lindstrand v. Delta Lumber Co., 68 Mich. 261.

¶ 1171. Where a caving-in of defendant's mine whereby plaintiff's intestate was killed was incident to the work of mining, and where decedent had been ordered to continue at work after complaint made of the unsafe condition of the premises, the defense that decedent was contributorily negligent in knowingly remaining in the vicinity of danger was held inadmissible.—Schlacker v. Ashland Iron Min. Co., 89 Mich. 253.

¶ 1172. Where a carpenter is employed by the owner in constructing a scaffold to do work on a cupola on a new building, the steel framework of which had been constructed by an independent contractor, and is injured as the result of the falling of the scaffold due to the absence of a bolt in a steel beam on which the platform rested, while the doctrine of safe place does not apply, yet the fact that he was directed to begin his work on top of a steel structure finished by an independent contractor is material as bearing upon his contributory negligence and the negligence of his employer.—Porth v. Cadillac Motor Car Co., 198 Mich. 501.

§ 59o. Comparative negligence of master and servant.

¶ 1173. Where a servant, whose duty it was jointly with two others to remove to the ground an ice chute used in conveying ice from railroad cars to an ice house when a car had been emptied, stood between the ice chute and the ice house platform facing a train bringing full cars of ice, and the train struck the chute and forced deceased between it and the platform, held that the negligence of the deceased was not lesser than that of defendant so as to preclude a recovery under Pub. Acts 1909, No. 104, § 2, How. St., 2nd Ed., § 4111, making contributory negligence no defense where negligence of employee less than of employer.—English v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 188 Mich. 286.

¶ 1174. Where the declaration in an action for personal injury sustained while working in plaintiff's factory shows substantially that at the time plaintiff was directed to adjust a belt on a shaft the machinery was in motion, it is unnecessary to allege that the regular way to adjust the shaft was when the machinery was not in motion.—Burk v. Burrell, 88 Mich. 289.

¶ 1175. Where the employment of a child under certain age is forbidden by statute (Pub. Acts 1901, No. 113, as amended by Pub. Acts 1905, No. 171) and the violation of such statute is relied upon as negligence in a personal injury suit facts from which an employment is prohibited by statute must be stated in the declaration.—Van Wyck v. Dickinson, 148 Mich. 418.

¶ 1176. In an action by a servant for personal injuries a declaration disclosing the facts relied upon as to plaintiff's ignorance and want of skill, the kind of labor to which he was accustomed, the danger of the described tool in the hands of an inexperienced workman, the duty of the master to properly instruct the plaintiff in the uses of the tool and its dangerous character, and how to hold it to prevent pieces of iron when cut loose from flying into the eyes, "and to have instructed plaintiff fully in the premises, yet plaintiff says that defendant, well knowing its duty as aforesaid and plaintiff's ignorance in that respect, neglected its duty in the premises, and on said day set plaintiff to work using said machine or tool, and did not then and there have the same in good proper working condition and good repair and order as was its duty, but the same was out of repair in that, etc. (describing wherein it was out of repair)," sufficiently avers neglect of duty on the part of the master to caution and instruct the plaintiff.—Brockmiller v. Industrial Works, 148 Mich. 642.

¶ 1177. A declaration alleged that the defendant ordered the plaintiff to go outside his usual employment of operating and managing the retorts for the manufacturing of wood alcohol, and directed him to help replace a derailed tram car on the track; that defendant did not acquaint the plaintiff with the dangers of the new employment; and that while so engaged plaintiff was injured. Held that the negligence of defendant was sufficiently set out.—Johnson v. Desmond Chemical Co., 152 Mich. 84.

¶ 1178. Where plaintiff alleged that defendant ordered him, outside his usual employment, to help replace a derailed tram car, and that defendant employed an improper method in replacing the car, whereby plaintiff was injured, held that it was not incumbent on the plaintiff to point out in his declaration the proper way for doing the work.—Johnson v. Desmond Chemical Co., 152 Mich. 84.

¶ 1179. In a suit for personal injuries by a servant, it is not always necessary to allege the general use or employment of a device, where the necessity for the same is obvious.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1180. A declaration for negligent injury to a servant is not demurrable for failure to state that the injured person did not know of the danger, if it does aver that he was without fault.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1181. In a suit against an employer for the negligent death of an employee, plaintiff's intestate, plaintiff is not called upon to negative in his declaration every fact which would tend to establish defendant's freedom from negligence.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1182. Declaration construed to aver the operation of a defective machine independent of a guard or want of guard, and also to aver a defective guard and not to aver that the machine was not guarded.—Scherer v. Otis Elevator Co., 167 Mich. 1.

¶ 1183. A declaration held sufficient in an action for injuries caused by the explosion of a boiler as the result of an employer's failure to inspect it.—Eberts v. Mt. Clemens Sugar Co., 182 Mich. 449.

¶ 1184. Plaintiff alleged that he was employed by defendant corporation as a night watchman in a manufacturing establishment; that there was a second story connected with the first story of the building by a narrow stairway not having any handrail on either side; that under his instructions it became his duty to pass up and down said stairway, and while so doing, in the performance of his duties in the line of his employment, he was hurt, owing to the absence of such protection and while exercising due care and caution. Plaintiff in said declaration called the building in one part a two-story building and in another part a one-story, and designated said stairway sometimes as a stairway and at other times as a ladder. Held, said declaration was sufficient upon demurrer to state a cause of action, under Act No. 285, Pub. Acts of 1909, § 14, requiring stairways to be provided with substantial handrails.—Davis v. Buss Mach. Works, 169 Mich. 498.

¶ 1185. A declaration alleging the injury of an employee by the explosion of a boiler as the result of an employer's breach of his nondelegable duty of inspection, is not demurrable, on the ground that those charged with the duty of inspection were the fellow-servants of the plaintiff.—Eberts v. Mt. Clemens Sugar Co., 182 Mich. 449.

¶ 1186. A declaration in an action for injuries received by a servant as the result of the explosion of a boiler due to the failure of the master to inspect it, which alleges that the plaintiff was unaware of the defective condition of the boiler, and that he was exercising due care at the time of his injury, is not demurrable on the ground that the defect, if one existed, was as apparent to the plaintiff as to the defendant.—Eberts v. Mt. Clemens Sugar Co., 182 Mich. 449.

¶ 1187. In an action by a servant against his employer for personal injuries a declaration stating the duties of the defendant under eight heads and averring that none of these duties was performed, causing injuries to plaintiff, reasonably informs the defendant of the nature of the case it is called upon to defend and is sufficient under the Judicature Act.—Douglas v. Temple Mfg. Co., 197 Mich. 138.

Issues and variance in actions by railroad employees, see post § 61a.

¶ 1188. In an action against a railroad company for personal injuries, a declaration alleging that plaintiff, while acting under the foreman, was ordered by him to pull the coupling-pin and jump across to the other car, and that then without any notice to plaintiff the foreman let off the brake, which suddenly accelerated the speed of the car and widened the distance which plaintiff was to jump, that plaintiff had no knowledge or information that the brake was to be let off, and that by that means plaintiff was injured without fault or negligence on his part, was held sufficient.—Erickson v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co., 88 Mich. 281.

¶ 1189. A declaration, in an action against a railroad showing that the engineer ran his engine against plaintiff when moving it on orders received from the roadmaster, is defective where it contains no allegation of fact indicating that the order was negligent or improper, and does not state that the customary signals were omitted by the engineer.—Hammond v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 162 Mich. 431.

¶ 1190. A declaration the gist of which is that defendant's roadmaster directed an engineer in charge of defendant's engine to move the same when plaintiff was in a place of danger, that is, a few feet in front of the engine on the track and with his back towards the engine, does not on its face disclose negligence.—Hammond v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 162 Mich. 431.

¶ 1191. In an action against a railroad to recover for the death of a sectionman at a crossing, it was held that the declaration stated a cause of action independent of statute, counting upon a common-law duty to furnish a locomotive with a suitable whistle as a reasonable instrumentality in its efficient operation, and a breach thereof.—Lepard v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 166 Mich. 373.

¶ 1192. In an action against a railroad to recover for the death of a sectionman at a crossing, it was held that the declaration set forth a statutory duty and also a duty independent of statute to place, equip, and maintain a steam whistle upon the locomotive in a reasonable repair.—Lepard v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 166 Mich. 373.

¶ 1193. In determining the sufficiency of a declaration to recover for a death caused by a boiler explosion, the defendant owner of the engine, having the care and control of same, is presumed to have as good, if not better, means of information as to its construction and condition as has the plaintiff.—Creen v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 168 Mich. 104.

¶ 1194. In a suit for the death of plaintiff's intestate from a boiler explosion, the declaration alleged in one count the duty and neglect of defendant to provide a boiler of sufficient strength; to employ inspectors and repairmen; and to cause said inspectors and repairmen to act at proper times in looking after the boiler, water glass, valves, water spaces, fire box, etc. Held, the declaration was not bad on special demurrer as being multifarious and uncertain in alleging different acts of negligence in one count.—Creen v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 168 Mich. 104.

¶ 1195. On action against a railroad company for injuries received because of an alleged breach of duty, a statute imposing such duty need not be pleaded by the plaintiff to enable him to avail himself of it when the defendant sets up assumption of risk.—Wallin v. Arcadia & B. River Ry. Co., 172 Mich. 466.

¶ 1196. An allegation in a declaration in an action by the administrator of the estate of a railroad fireman against an interstate railroad for the negligent death of decedent that defendant owned, at the time of the injury, and was operating a railway system extending through the states of Michigan and Indiana, and that decedent was employed by it in the construction, repairing, and maintenance of the roadbed of such railroad, amounts to an allegation that defendant was engaged in interstate commerce and that decedent was employed by it in such commerce.—Jorgensen v. Grand Rapids & I. Ry. Co., 189 Mich. 537.

¶ 1197. In a suit against an employer for the negligent death of an employee, due to the falling of a skip in a mining shaft, the declaration alleged: (1) That to keep the skip from falling while being loaded the drum must be put in gear with the steam cylinders of the hoist; (2) that the only way to do this is for the engineer to stand by the hoist with his hand on the friction lever; (3) that the engineer's other duties make it at times impossible for him to do this; (4) and therefore it was defendant's duty to publish a rule for notifying the engineer that the skip was being loaded. Held, these allegations sufficiently established the duty in question, of the defendant.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1198. In a suit for personal injuries to a servant from the falling of a mining skip, the declaration sufficiently alleges the duty of the master, and his breach thereof, which states that it was his duty to see that the skip be kept firmly secured while the servant was standing on it, engaged in loading, and that he failed to provide a safe place for the servant to stand while so engaged.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1199. In a suit against an employer for the negligent death of an employee, due to the falling of a skip in a mining shaft, the declaration alleged: (1) That to securely hold the skip while being loaded, the friction bar must be kept in place by the hand of the engineer; (2) that the employee was negligently sent upon the skip; (3) that on account of the lack of a rule directing the engineer to stand by and hold the friction bar, the drum became ungeared, and the skip fell and injured the employee. Held, these allegations are sufficient to show that defendant's failure to make necessary rules was the proximate cause of the accident.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1200. In a suit for personal injuries to a servant from the falling of a mining skip, the declaration sufficiently alleges the negligence of the defendant in not providing a necessary attachment to be the proximate cause of the accident, by stating that "because of the negligence aforesaid, the skip fell," etc.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1201. In a suit against an employer for the negligent death of an employee, due to the falling of a skip in a mining shaft, the declaration alleged: (1) That to make the skip safe, the engineer must remain at the hoist and keep the friction lever in place; (2) that the defendant well knew that the engineer was by other duties called away from the hoist at times; (3) that the defendant negligently required the engineer to be away from the hoist, on other duties, when it was being loaded, whereby the skip fell and the employee was injured. Held, the declaration sufficiently alleged a breach of duty by defendant to employ sufficient men.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1202. In a suit for personal injuries to a servant due to the falling of a skip into a mine shaft, the declaration alleged that: (1) Unless the friction lever is kept in place by hand, it will work loose and let the skip fall; and (2) that the engineer was required by other duties to leave the hoist, and as a consequence the friction lever did work loose and the skip did fall. Held, the declaration sufficiently alleged what caused the skip to get loose, and descend.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1203. In a suit against an employer for the negligent death of an employee, due to the falling of a skip in a mining shaft, the declaration alleged: (1) That to securely hold the skip while being loaded the friction bar must be held in place by the hand of the engineer; (2) that the employee was negligently sent upon the skip; (3) that on account of the lack of a rule directing the engineer to stand by and hold the friction bar, the drum became ungeared, the skip fell to the bottom of the shaft, and the employee was injured. Held, these allegations were sufficient to show how the drum became loose and the skip descended.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1204. In a suit for personal injuries to a servant from the falling of a mining skip, the declaration sufficiently alleges the defendant's negligence as the cause of the injury, which states that, by reason of his failure to have the skip securely kept in place at the collar of the shaft, the skip fell, etc.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1205. Plaintiff sued defendant employer for personal injury of plaintiff's intestate, due to the falling of a skip in a mining shaft. The issuable facts were: (1) Whether the defendant was guilty of negligence in failing to make and promulgate a rule for notifying the engineer when loading was being done, and requiring him to remain at the hoist to set the foot brake and keep in place the friction lever; and (2) whether, if so, such negligence was the proximate cause of the death of plaintiff's decedent. These facts were alleged in the declaration. Held, the declaration was not demurrable because it failed to allege that the foot brake was or was not set.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1206. A declaration setting forth facts to show that defendant failed to employ sufficient men in the work of managing and loading a mining skip sufficiently alleges this negligence as the cause of the accident when it states that by reason of the negligence aforesaid the skip fell, etc.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1207. Where a count in a suit for personal injuries to a servant from the falling of a mining skip alleges a breach of duty by the master for failure to provide an attachment to hold the friction lever in place, it is not necessary to allege whether the engineer in charge of the hoist did or did not know that the servant was engaged in loading the skip.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1208. Where a count alleges as the cause of the falling of a mining skip, the failure of the master to provide a certain attachment to keep the friction lever in place, the allegation is sufficient which states that the hoist was not so fitted with the device, and that while the engineer was absent and not attending to the friction lever, the skip fell.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1209. Where, in a suit for personal injuries, the facts set forth in a declaration show that a certain appliance was necessary and practicable to pervent a mining skip from falling and injuring the plaintiff, the allegations of duty on the part of the defendant to supply the same are sufficiently definite if, from the facts alleged, the duty may be implied.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1210. A declaration alleged that the injury of an employee by the falling of a mining skip was caused by the negligence of the employer in failing to provide a certain attachment. Held, that negligent absence of the engineer from the hoist was only a concurring cause of the accident, and failure to allege this fact did not render the declaration insufficient.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1211. A declaration attempted to place a liability on the defendant employer for an injury to an employee, caused by the falling of a mining skip while it was being loaded. The negligence alleged was the failure of the defendant to publish a rule that the engineer should remain at the hoist while the loading was going on. Held, that the declaration was not demurrable on the ground that the servant assumed the risk, since it contained no intimation that he knew there was no such rule.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1212. In a suit for personal injuries to plaintiff miner, due to an explosion in defendant's mine, the declaration alleged that various shifts of men were employed in working the different levels of the mine; that in order to protect plaintiff from injury it was necessary that one shift should know what the other shifts were doing with regard to the placing of explosives; that it was necessary that there should be adequate appliances for hoisting the shifts of men up the shaft to the surface, to escape injury; that it was necessary that there should be an adequate signal system in said shaft to secure the quick operation of said hoisting apparatus; that defendant failed to supply such adequate signal system and appliances, and upon signal being given failed to use reasonable diligence in operating said hoisting apparatus so as to enable plaintiff to get out of said mine and out of the way of dangerous explosives placed in one of the levels of the mine by other shifts of men, and that as a result plaintiff was injured by explosives in said mine. Held, the declaration was sufficient upon demurrer.—Panela v. Castile Min. Co., 165 Mich. 329.

Burden of proof, see post § 62.

General law as to issues, proof and variance, see Pleading, IX, X.

¶ 1213. In an action for negligent injury the inquiry should be confined to what is pertinent. Where the accident arose entirely from plaintiff's use of a trimmer saw, inquiry as to the general management of the mill or the particular management of slab-cars should be excluded, whatever negligence there may have been in furnishing a poor slab-car or in requiring plaintiff to use it.—Lindstrand v. Delta Lumber Co., 65 Mich. 254.

¶ 1214. The servant, in an action for damages against the master for personal injuries received, in the course of his employment, as the result of the defendant's negligence, must bring by his proof the cause of the accident within the allegations of his declaration.—Wheeler v. Berry, 95 Mich. 250.

¶ 1215. Employers may use such machinery as they choose, provided it is sound, well made and kept in repair: and in an action for injuries caused by its use the question whether a different kind of machinery would not have been safer cannot be considered.—Richards v. Rough, 53 Mich. 212.

¶ 1216. In an action for an injury caused by defendant's negligence in setting plaintiff, a boy thirteen years old, at work upon a dangerous machine without proper appliances, evidence that working at the machine made the boy dizzy is not admissible, no complaint being set forth in the declaration of negligence in respect of that, and it not being suggested that such effect upon plaintiff led in any way to the accident.—Steiler v. Hart, 65 Mich. 644.

¶ 1217. Evidence that a plank on which a servant stood while oiling a shaft was slippery with oil and water will not support a recovery under a declaration alleging improper construction of the platform on which he stood.—Zimmerman v. Detroit Sulphite Fibre Co., 113 Mich. 1.

¶ 1218. The question as to whether plaintiff's employment as a common laborer included the duty of assisting in holding up and bolting to place an iron plate forming a part of the shaft in which the buckets in a beet sugar mill were conveyed was immaterial, in an action for injuries received while performing such work as directed by his master, by one corner of the plate being caught by a descending bucket; since the danger was so apparent as to call for no warning.—White v. Owosso Sugar Co., 149 Mich. 473.

¶ 1219. In an action by a servant against the master for personal injuries where the sole theory of the declaration is that boards upon which heavily loaded trucks were moved were uneven, unsound, rotten, unsafe and defective in consequence of which the place was unsafe, the plaintiff cannot recover upon the theory that sound boards were not sufficiently strong or that the end of the boards would be pressed into the soft ground. —Shanke v. United States Heater Co., 125 Mich. 346.

¶ 1220. There can be no recovery in an action for personal injuries to a servant, where the declaration alleged negligence on the part of defendant in employing plaintiff, a boy of immature years and without experience, to work on a dangerous machine requiring skill and extraordinary care to operate, and in failing to warn plaintiff of the dangerous character of such machine, and to properly instruct him how to operate it, and contained no allegation as to such machine being out of repair; but where the evidence showed that plaintiff was injured by the "self tripping" of the machine, due to the fact that it was out of order and not in safe condition to operate; such variance between the proof and the pleading being fatal.—Chall v. Detroit Stove Co., 140 Mich. 68.

¶ 1221. Under a declaration for negligence consisting in the misplacement of a controlling lever so that an operator to use it had to place his body in a line of danger, where it appears that the machine was not originally faulty but that the change in location of the lever was due to wear allowing it to swing away from its original position, the liability, if any, must be based on negligence in not repairing after knowledge or notice or in not inspecting and discovering it.—Dutchowski v. Handy Things Co., 141 Mich. 11.

¶ 1222. Variance between a declaration alleging defective guard and proof that there was no guard on a machine, held fatal.—Scherer v. Otis Elevator Co., 167 Mich. 1.

¶ 1223. In a suit for personal injuries a declaration alleged that while attempting to uncouple cars plaintiff was injured on account of a defective drawhead on the car in question. His proof showed that the drawhead was all right, but that the bolts holding same were defective and caused the accident. Held, the trial court properly refused to direct a verdict for defendant on the ground of variance between the proof and the allegations of the declaration.—Van Leuvan v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 167 Mich. 355.

¶ 1224. Plaintiff was injured by a log while employed in loading logs on the carriage of the saw in a sawmill. He alleged in his declaration that the injury was due to defects in the kickers used to kick the logs over on the carriage. Under this declaration he was permitted to prove that the steam engine operating the kickers was out of repair. Held, although the declaration was not broad enough to admit this evidence, still the decision should not be reversed, since plaintiff would, upon request, have been permitted to amend, and defendant did not complain of being taken by surprise.—Edwards v. Engadine Lumber Co., 158 Mich. 428.

¶ 1225. Where, in a suit for injuries to an employee at a drug store from the explosion of a soda fountain tank, the negligence charged is the failure to furnish sound and safe tanks, it is immaterial whether defendant's negligence arises from a failure to inspect and repair or a failure to substitute new tanks for old ones.—McDonnell v. Central Drug Co., 170 Mich. 291.

¶ 1226. Where a plaintiff miner alleges negligence by the defendant for failure to supply adequate appliances for hoisting the miners out of a mine and an adequate signal system to use in times of danger from explosives, he cannot under such a general allegation be permitted to show that some other signal system and arrangement would have been better than the one in use at the particular time, if that in use was in a reasonably proper condition to do what it was expected and required to do when signals were given for hoisting.—Panela v. Castile Min. Co., 165 Mich. 329.

¶ 1227. A declaration of a miner, injured by a fall of rock, alleged that defendant was negligent in mining out all the ore between two levels without leaving pillars or obstructions to prevent rock from above the upper level from falling into an opening between the levels and into the lower level, and in failing to inspect above the upper level. It was claimed that recovery was had on a different theory; that rock fell from the back to the floor of the upper level; that it then broke and a part of it rolled into the opening; that defendant should have anticipated such a happening; and that inspection should have been made and continued from the place where the rock fell. The testimony was conflicting upon every phase of the case, which was tried upon the merits. Held, plaintiff recovered upon the case made by his declaration.—Moilanen v. Washington Iron Co., 176 Mich. 505.

¶ 1228. Where a woodworker injured by a sliver flying from a machine bases his right to recover on a violation of a promise to place a hood over the side knives, evidence of a custom of other factories using similar machines to place a hood over the knives is inadmissible.—Gorrey v. W. F. Hurd Co., 177 Mich. 116.

¶ 1229. There is a variance between a declaration averring that a quarry employee carried his dinner to his working place and was injured at his working place during the noon hour, and proof that he was on a public highway where he had gone to avoid the blasting at his working place.—Moronen v. McDonnell, 177 Mich. 691.

¶ 1230. In an action to recover for injuries sustained by a child of twelve years while employed at a dangerous machine in violation of Act No. 285, Pub. Acts 1909, as amended by Act No. 220, Pub. Acts 1911, §§ 4009-4063, How. St., 2nd Ed., held that there was not a variance between the allegations of the declaration and the proof.—Schuetz v. Van Orman, 184 Mich. 478.

¶ 1231. The testimony of an employee who was in a position to know, that the signaling apparatus for the movement of a skip in a mine shaft, was never inspected except when it failed completely to work, is admissible under an allegation of the failure of an employer to maintain, inspect and repair a proper signaling apparatus.—Paskvan v. Allouez Min. Co., 187 Mich. 101.

Contributory negligence of mine employees, see ante § 59g.

¶ 1232. A declaration for negligent injury to a brakeman while uncoupling cars set forth that it was occasioned by a deep hole between the rails. The evidence was that it was between the rails of a side track. Held, that the declaration would naturally be construed to refer to the main track, and that the variance was material, especially when taken in connection with other variances as to the nature of the hole and the extent of the injury.—Batterson v. Chicago & G. T. Ry. Co., 49 Mich. 184.

¶ 1233. Where the declaration, in an action for negligent injury, alleged that plaintiff was employed as a switchman, and was discharging his duty as such when injured, while the proofs showed that he was foreman of a switch crew and had control of the engine, held, that the variance was immaterial.—Ashman v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 90 Mich. 567.

¶ 1234. Proof that plaintiff, a common laborer, was sent to pull a coupling pin in a train and that in jumping from one car to another as the train parted he was injured by the foreman's act of releasing brakes without plaintiff's knowledge, thereby accelerating the parting, is not equivalent to showing that his capacity of brakeman for the occasion had been discharged and that of laborer resumed, and therefore is not variant from a declaration alleging that, as a common laborer, plaintiff was sent to perform the duties of brakeman and was injured while so employed.—Erickson v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co., 93 Mich. 414.

¶ 1235. A complaint in a negligence case, framed on the theory that a freight car, which the deceased mounted for the purpose of uncoupling, was moving backward uncontrolled, and proof that the train was moving forward under its conductor's order, presents a fatal variance.—Pennington v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 90 Mich. 505.

¶ 1236. A declaration alleging "a hole" in defendant's track and proof that there was a space at that point where there were unfilled intervals between the ties making holes into one of which plaintiff stepped are not variant in that the very hole was not specifically pleaded.—Ragon v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co., 97 Mich. 265.

¶ 1237. Averment of injury caused by having to walk on an unballasted track while coupling cars and dropping down into the space between ties is variant from proof that the injury was due to resting plaintiff's arm against a car standing there, while waiting for the approach of the car to be coupled, and having his arm caught between the deadwoods of the cars when they came together.—Mueller v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 105 Mich. 487.

¶ 1238. Under an allegation in a declaration that it was necessary for plaintiff, a brakeman, to ride back and forth on the side of cars and that such was the usual manner of performing and going to and from his work, testimony indicating that plaintiff might lawfully so ride while ascending to the top of the car, did not constitute such a variance as to surprise the defendant.—Potter v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 122 Mich. 179.

¶ 1239. A fatal variance between a declaration and the proof of a contract is not shown by an allegation that the plaintiff had previously been employed as a passenger brakeman and proof that he was formerly employed as a freight brakeman.—Sax v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 125 Mich. 252.

¶ 1240. A defendant in a personal injury action cannot be heard to object to a variance between a declaration and the proofs where the controversy on the trial was clear, no objection on the evidence was made, the case was tried on the theory supported by the proof and no element of surprise is shown.—Jarvis v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 128 Mich. 61.

¶ 1241. In an action by a brakeman who, while engaged in coupling in front of a moving car, was run over after falling into a ditch covered with snow, which had been constructed during his temporary absence, it was competent for him to testify for what purpose he got down from the ladder and started to pass through in front of the moving car which ran over his leg; as the declaration alleged that he was in the performance of his duty as a brakeman, and was using due care and prudence.—DeCair v. Manistee & G. R. R. Co., 133 Mich. 578.

¶ 1242. In an action for personal injuries sustained in a collision between two trains each containing cars billed to points outside the state, which fact plaintiff could not have discovered, he was held entitled to recover under the Federal Employers' Liability Act though he failed to plead it, an amendment being permissible.—Fernette v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 175 Mich. 653.

¶ 1243. In an action for personal injuries by a street railway conductor against the street railway company, the failure to properly inspect the car in the barns cannot be relied on for recovery where it is not alleged in the declaration.—Whitcomb v. Detroit Electric Ry., 125 Mich. 572.

¶ 1244. In an action by a motorman for personal injuries where the alleged duty of the defendant street-railroad company was to "equip and supply its said car with sand boxes and sand" the question as to whether there was a pail of sand or a shovel provided with which he could throw sand on the track in case of emergency is wholly immaterial, there being no such ground of negligence alleged in the declaration.—Mayer v. Detroit, Y., A. A. & J. Ry., 142 Mich. 459.

¶ 1245. The orders of a master are so far presumptively lawful that the servant has the burden of showing a lawful reason for disobeying them.—Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Bayfield, 37 Mich. 205.

¶ 1246. A brakeman who enters into a contract with a railway company by which he acknowledges the receipt of a copy of rules of the company, and agrees to abide by them, has the burden of proving that the company sanctioned a departure from one of its rules by a custom so universal and notorious that the company was presumed to have had knowledge of it and to have ratified it.—Fluhrer v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 121 Mich. 212.

¶ 1247. While the law does not hold persons using machinery to any absolute duty of insuring its safety, it requires some care in introducing untried novelties; and where the result of any defect must be an immediate danger to human life, it devolves on those who expose such life to the danger of a new experiment that turns out badly to show that they have followed such a course as the understood rules of service or mechanics applicable to such matters rendered safe according to ordinary probabilities.—Marshall v. Widdicomb Furniture Co., 67 Mich. 167.

¶ 1248. The burden of showing that an employee's injury is within a contract exempting an employer from liability for negligence rests on the latter.—Cottrell v. Michigan United Traction Co., 184 Mich. 221.

¶ 1249. The burden was upon the iron mill company, employer, to show that the servant knew and understood the increased danger, where, in an action for injuries to an infant employee, it appears that he was injured in consequence of a risk not ordinarily incident to the employment, growing out of the master's negligence.—McDonald v. Champion Iron & Steel Co., 140 Mich. 401.

¶ 1250. If a servant shows that he has been injured in consequence of an unusual risk due to his master's negligence the master has the burden of showing that the servant knew of the increased danger.—Swoboda v. Ward, 40 Mich. 420.

¶ 1251. Where a servant shows that he was injured in consequence of an unusual risk due to his master's negligence, the master has the burden of showing that the servant knew of the unusual danger.—Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co., 154 Mich. 423.

¶ 1252. Where, in an action for personal injuries, it is sought to charge one as master, the plaintiff must show that at the time of the alleged injury the relation of master and servant existed between the parties.—Smedley v. Mashek Chemical & Iron Co., 189 Mich. 64.

Care and diligence required of master, see ante § 33.
Presumptions of negligence, see post § 63a.

¶ 1253. A servant cannot recover from his master for a negligent injury received in his service without showing some fault on the part of the master.—Quincy Mining Co. v. Kitts, 42 Mich. 34.

¶ 1254. General reputation of unfitness would be admissible as evidence, and might be sufficient to charge the company with knowledge, notwithstanding they may have been actually ignorant of it. The ignorance will be negligence in a case in which any proper inquiry would have obtained the information, and where the duty to inquire was plainly imperative. But the burden of proof to establish the unfitness alleged as the ground of the plaintiff's action and the defendant's knowledge of it is upon the plaintiff.—Davis v. Detroit & M. R. Co., 20 Mich. 105.

¶ 1255. In an action for wrongful death caused by the alleged incompetence of the yardmaster of the railway company, the plaintiff must show that the company was guilty of negligence in first employing such yardmaster because unfitted for the position, or in afterwards retaining him. This may be done by showing specific acts of incompetency, and bringing them home to the knowledge of the company, or by showing them to be of such a nature and character, and frequency, that the company in the exercise of due care on its part must have brought them to its notice.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 46 Mich. 176.

¶ 1256. A railroad company cannot be held liable as for the consequences of negligently retaining incompetent servants if, in exercising due care and diligence to see that its employees are competent, careful and sober, it fails to discover that they are not. But the degree of diligence which they must exercise must correspond to the servant's responsibility, and it is for a jury to say what reasonable diligence may be. The presumption is that the company has done its duty, and the burden of proving the contrary is on the party complaining of its negligence.—Hilts v. Chicago & G. T. Ry., 55 Mich. 437.

¶ 1257. In an action for wrongful death the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show that the defendant sawmill company did not use due care in the selection of a competent sawyer as a fellow-servant.—Kellogg v. Stephens Lumber Co., 125 Mich. 222.

¶ 1258. Before a master can be held liable on the ground that he has in his employ an incompetent servant, it must appear that he has been negligent either in employing or retaining him, and the burden is upon the plaintiff to show negligence in that regard, the presumption being that the master was not negligent in either respect.—Seccombe v. Detroit Elec. Ry., 133 Mich. 170.

¶ 1259. A servant whose employer has not elected to come under the Workmen's Compensation Act cannot recover for injuries in the absence of evidence of some negligence on the latter's part.—Lydman v. DeHaas, 185 Mich. 128, 8 N. C. C. A. 649.

Evidence as to contributory negligence, see post §§ 64h, 65 l.
Sufficiency of proofs under Federal Employers' Liability Act, see post § 66.
Jury questions as to contributory negligence, see post § 68.

¶ 1260. In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act the burden of proving contributory negligence is upon the defendant.—Holmberg v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 188 Mich. 605. (Brooke, C. J., and Ostrander, J., dissenting.)

¶ 1261. In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act the rule of the federal courts as to the burden of proving contributory negligence governs.—Holmberg v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 188 Mich. 605. (Brooke, C. J., and Ostrander, J., dissenting.)

¶ 1262. The rule of the federal courts in an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act that the burden of proving contributory negligence is upon the defendant does not prevent the defendant from securing the benefit of the establishment of contributory negligence of the plaintiff by the latter's own testimony, as the burden of proof as to the defendant begins with the condition of the case as it stands upon undisputed facts upon plaintiff's own testimony.—Holmberg v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 188 Mich. 605. (Brooke, C. J., and Ostrander, J., dissenting.)

Employee's negligence as sole cause of injury and relation of same to contributory negligence in actions under Federal Employers' Liability Act, see note, 10 N. C. C. A. 926-938.

Presumptions in actions for wrongful discharge or wages, see ante §§ 20, 27.
Burden of proof, see ante § 62.
General law of presumptions, see Evidence, II.

¶ 1263. In a suit brought by a railroad employee against the company for damages caused by the alleged unskilfulness or negligence of another employee of the same company, the defendants are entitled to the benefit of a presumption that they exercised due care in the employment of their servants, and that they had no knowledge of the defects of character or incapacity imputed.—Davis v. Detroit & M. R. Co., 20 Mich. 105.

¶ 1264. When a master has exercised due care in the employment of a servant, he may rely upon the presumption of competency until he has notice or knowledge to the contrary.—Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines, 115 Mich. 629.

¶ 1265. The law raises no presumption that a boy seventeen years of age is too young to manage properly a brake by which is controlled the hoisting and lowering of passenger cages in a mine.—Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines, 115 Mich. 629.

¶ 1266. An employee may frequently use machinery in a negligent manner, but if such negligent use leaves no trace behind it, which it is the duty of the master upon inspection to see, no presumption of knowledge on the part of the master arises.—Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines, 115 Mich. 629.

¶ 1267. A master is bound to exercise the care only that an ordinarily prudent person situated like himself would exercise, and is bound to know only what such an ordinarily prudent person would know; so one who uses purchased varnishes in his business cannot be presumed to know that a can of "bronzine" contained any dangerous explosive. To know this he must possess more knowledge than is possessed by the ordinarily informed buyer and user of varnishes, and to hold an employer liable for injuries resulting to his employee upon the assumption that he had such knowledge would require him to exercise extraordinary care.—Siegel v. United Elect. Heating Co., 143 Mich. 484.

¶ 1268. A master using paints and varnishes in his business, exercising the care of an ordinarily prudent person in like circumstances, cannot be held liable for an injury to an employee because he had failed to warn him of the danger, where it appeared that although he had knowledge of the danger of bringing paints and varnishes in contact with fire, he could not be assumed to have knowledge that they would emit vapors which would take fire from a stove several feet distant.—Siegel v. United Elect. Heating Co., 143 Mich. 484.

¶ 1269. In an action against a railway company for negligent injury to an employee from a defect in a roadway which has just come under its control from another company, there can be no presumption that defendant had had sufficient time to remedy the defect.—Batterson v. Chicago & G. T. Ry. Co., 49 Mich. 184.

¶ 1270. A court cannot presume that a common laborer in a foundry or machine shop is possessed of the scientific knowledge necessary to enable him to comprehend and avoid the danger liable to ensue upon the contact of molten iron with an icy roadway.—Smith v. Peninsular Car Works, 60 Mich. 501.

¶ 1271. One engaged in railroading may be presumed to understand the nature of the work he is entering upon, and if he is not acquainted with the particular dangers of the line upon which he is to work, it is his duty to give attention to them, and he must be on the lookout for buildings near tracks and to know what persons usually know of the use of side tracks and such dangers as naturally follow.—Pahlan v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 122 Mich. 232.

¶ 1272. A brakeman is not chargeable with knowledge of the abutting of a fish chute upon a part of the main track outside the yards, where he was not familiar with the surroundings and had no opportunity to make himself familiar with them, and he has the right to expect that such obstacles will not be placed in such close proximity to the track as to make them dangerous to a brakeman using the side ladder of a car; but the rule is very different as to an obstruction abutting on a side track.—Phelps v. Chicago & West Mich. R. Co., 122 Mich. 171.

¶ 1273. A brakeman is chargeable with knowledge of the existence of conveniences for the handling of freight, such as fish chutes, near switch tracks, and must therefore be on the lookout for them.—Phelps v. Chicago & West Mich. R. Co., 122 Mich. 171.

¶ 1274. A switchman operating on a switch for the first time is not bound to know of lumber piled so close to the track as to prevent his riding past it on the side of a car, although he is bound to know of all permanent structures so placed.—Bradburn v. Wabash R. Co., 134 Mich. 575.

§ 63a. ——Of negligence.

¶ 1275. Mere occurrence of an accident with injury raises no presumption of negligence against a master sued by his injured servant.—Fuller v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 141 Mich. 66.

¶ 1276. The mere fact that an accident has occurred resulting in the injury of an employee raises no presumption of negligence on the part of the master.—Siegel v. Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 160 Mich. 270.

¶ 1277. The negligence of a master cannot be presumed in an action by a servant for injuries received in the discharge of his duties.—Maki v. Isle Royale Copper Co., 180 Mich. 624.

¶ 1278. While plaintiff employed in defendant's boiler-shop was riveting pieces of a boiler-front placed in position before him, they fell upon him and injured him. Held, that he could not recover without evidence of negligence on defendant's part, the mere fact of the accident not being enough to impose liability.—Toomey v. Eureka Iron & Steel Works, 89 Mich. 249.

¶ 1279. An engineer who was killed by the derailment of his train in rounding a curve, assumed the risk of the accident happening from a cause for which there was no reasonable explanation.—Peppett v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 119 Mich. 640.

¶ 1280. In the absence of any evidence of inadequacy of inspection in the barns of a street railway company, a conductor cannot recover for personal injuries by showing that the trolley pole was found badly bent on his first trip out after several miles had been covered without apparent defect and after the trolley had left the wire at one place.—Whitcomb v. Detroit Electric Ry., 125 Mich. 572.

¶ 1281. In the absence of direct testimony it is not within either the province of the court or the jury to speculate as to how an accident happened, wherein a servant fell from the place where he was working.—Sheon v. Kerr-Murray Mfg. Co., 146 Mich. 99.

¶ 1281a. Negligence in failing to provide a safe place to work cannot be predicated on the bare fact that a torpedo was lying on a car which plaintiff, a car-repairer, was repairing, and that when he threw a wrench upon the car it struck and exploded the torpedo, injuring him, and where he saw and recognized it as one of defendant's torpedies; but with nothing to show how or by whom it came there or that defendant was responsible for its being there.—Fuller v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 141 Mich. 66.

¶ 1282. The rule that an accident is not in itself evidence of negligence has no application where a railroad company permitted a planing mill to load refuse in an open barrel car and a piece of the refuse fell off and derailed a handcar upon which plaintiff was riding, there being no other probable theory of the cause of the accident.—McLean v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 137 Mich. 482.

¶ 1283. An employer is not liable for injuries to his employee from the explosion of a barrel of paint, which had taken fire without the employer's fault, occurring while the employee and others, at the request of the employer, were endeavoring to extinguish the flames, where the peril was such as to justify the request given.—Burke v. Parker, etc., Co., 107 Mich. 88.

¶ 1284. Where an employee, observing the usual precaution, is injured while engaged in switching and handling cars in the usual and customary manner, negligence on the part of the employer will not be presumed unless it is shown that the method adopted was in itself improper.—Miller v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 185 Mich. 482.

Doctrine of res ipsa loquitur as applicable in actions under Federal Employers' Liability Act, see note, 10 N. C. C. A. 853-860; 15 N. C. C. A. 591-617.

§ 63b. ——Contributory negligence.

Jury questions as to contributory negligence, see post § 68.

¶ 1285. Plaintiff's decedent was killed while operating a ripsaw, by being struck by a piece of timber thrown back by the saw. No one saw the accident. Held, that it was error to direct a verdict for the failure of the plaintiff to prove that the deceased was exercising due care, since, in the absence of eye witnesses, a presumption of law exists that he was free from contributory negligence.—Van Doorn v. Heap, 160 Mich. 199.

Acts and declarations by agents and servants as res gestæ, see Evidence §§ 478-484.

Admissions and declarations by servants and agents as evidence against principal, see Evidence, VII, C, 3, D.

Exaction of executory waiver after accident from other servants as admission of liability, see Evidence ¶ 2117.

Judicial notice of mechanical facts and working experiences, see Evidence § 16.

¶ 1286. Where one who has been employed in a manufacturing establishment sues his employer for an injury to his health arising from a process of manufacture, a certificate of plaintiff's admission to the poor-house as a public charge, after such injury, is irrelevant, and is prejudicial to defendant.—Fox v. Peninsular White Lead & Color Works, 92 Mich. 243.

¶ 1287. It was error to refuse to permit plaintiff in an action for personal injuries to show how many of the section-men employed had had no experience with that kind of work, the severity of the work, whether any of the men gave out before the accident to plaintiff, whether plaintiff could see the rail before it hit him, and whether loading the rails upon moving cars was more dangerous than upon stationary cars.—Palmer v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 87 Mich. 281.

¶ 1288. Evidence of the physical facts surrounding an accident are relevant and material in an action under Act No. 104, Pub. Acts 1909, §§ 4110-4116, How. St., 2nd Ed., to recover for injuries sustained by a motorman as the result of a collision between interurban cars.—Darling v. Grand Rapids, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 184 Mich. 607.

¶ 1289. An annual report of the Michigan Bureau of Labor is not admissible to show that a factory inspector ordered the knives of a planer to be covered.—Koehler v. Abey, 168 Mich. 118.

¶ 1290. In an action against a railroad company by one of its engineers for a negligent injury, it was error to permit the introduction by plaintiff of defendant's time-card, which related exclusively to the duty of station agents; the evidence showing that there was no agent at the station where the injury occurred.—Hewitt v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 67 Mich. 61.

¶ 1291. In an action for the wrongful death of an engineer of a railroad resulting from a collision caused by the alleged negligence of the company's yardmaster in sending a switch-engine and a train of cars upon the main track when another train was past due, evidence as to the number of engines ordinarily employed in switching, the number of freight trains there on an average, and the number of tracts is properly admitted as tending to show the character and importance of the yardmaster's work, and the dangers incident thereto.—Michigan Central R. Co. v. Gilbert, 46 Mich. 176.

§ 64a. ——As to existence of relation and scope of employment.

Jury questions as to existence of relation and scope of employment, see post § 67a.

¶ 1292. In an action by a brakeman for injuries received while assigned to more dangerous work, a train baggageman's opinion that the work to which he also was assigned was outside the line of his duty is immaterial.—Jones v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 49 Mich. 573.

§ 64b. ——As to safety of tools, appliances and places.

Weight and sufficiency of evidence, see post § 65d.

Expert and opinion testimony as to mechanics, construction, tools, and appliances, see Evidence §§ 226, 265.

¶ 1293. In a suit to recover for the death of a motorman alleged to have been caused by the failure of defendant railway to provide a brake as required by statute, it is not reversible error to permit an experienced motorman to testify as to the dangers attendant upon the kind of brake in use upon the car at the time of the accident.—Rivers v. Bay City Traction & Electric Co., 164 Mich. 696.

¶ 1294. Evidence as to the customary manner of inclosing elevator shafts is admissible in an action for injuries sustained by an employee, when the character of the inclosure has a causal bearing on the injury.—Fifelski v. Grand Rapids Gas Light Co., 181 Mich. 508.

¶ 1295. Error in the admission of expert evidence as to whether a freight elevator was a place of danger to life and limb, is harmless in a case in which the court will take judicial notice as to the dangerous character of the elevator.—Braasch v. Michigan Stove Co., 153 Mich. 652.

§ 64c. ——Prior or subsequent conditions or mishaps.

Evidence as to conditions and facts at times other than pleaded, see also Evidence § 94.

¶ 1296. In an action for negligence against an employer where, three months before the accident, defendant's elevator was repaired so that there was no difficulty in running it, testimony of a former employee of defendant as to the elevator's condition six months before the accident is immaterial.—Robinson v. Charles Wright & Co., 94 Mich. 288.

¶ 1297. In a suit for negligence against an employer it is not admissible in corroboration of testimony as to the condition of a blower in a planing mill at the time of an accident to show what its condition was a week afterward.—Kinney v. Folkerts, 84 Mich. 616.

¶ 1298. Evidence of a witness as to the condition of a clutch upon a machine may be introduced by plaintiff, although the witness did not examine the machine until two months after the accident, where there was no evidence of any repairs having been made, and the machine was operated in court upon the theory that its condition then was the same as at the time of the accident, and the evidence of defendant's expert indicated that the parts of the mechanism were hard, and not likely to wear seriously in two or three months.—Clemens v. Gem Fibre Package Co., 153 Mich. 495.

¶ 1299. In an action by a motorman against a street railway company for personal injuries caused by losing control of his car because of the slippery condition of the track, evidence of another runaway under the same circumstances is competent because it would be notice to defendant that it should have made all reasonable efforts to avoid such dangers.—Mayer v. Detroit, Y., A. A. & J. Ry., 142 Mich. 459.

¶ 1300. In an action by a motorman against a street railroad company for personal injuries caused by losing control of his car because of the slippery condition of the track the exclusion of a question to the depot master, one of plaintiff's witnesses, as to how many cars he had known to run away down the hill on which this car ran, furnishes no basis for an argument that plaintiff was prevented from showing other similar runaways for similar cases upon the same portion of the road, where no attempt was made to show that the witness knew anything about the cause or circumstance of other runaways.—Mayer v. Detroit, Y., A. A. & J. Ry., 142 Mich. 459.

¶ 1301. Testimony tending to show the presence of oil in the pipes through which ammonia in a refrigerating plant was pumped, and the impossibility of entirely avoiding it, was admissible in an action for injuries sustained from the blowing out of a pipe joint, where it appeared that oil had a softening effect on the gaskets of such joints.—Kaess v. Tivoli Brewing Co., 149 Mich. 371.

¶ 1302. In an action for personal injuries where the accident happened through the falling of an elevator there is no responsibility therefor where the evidence wholly fails to show the reason why the elevator had acted as it did, but evidence of other accidents is receivable to show why.—Casterton v. American Blower Co., 142 Mich. 407.

¶ 1303. On the question whether the absence of a guard and a spreader from a ripsaw was the proximate cause of a timber flying back and injuring plaintiff's deceased, it is admissible to prove previous similar "fly backs" from the same machine.—Van Doorn v. Heap, 160 Mich. 199.

¶ 1304. In a suit to recover for the death of a motorman alleged to have been caused by the failure of defendant railway to provide a brake as required by statute, it is not error to admit evidence to show the condition of the brake in use on the car two weeks before the accident and during the week preceding the accident, and to show the manner of operating the brake and the danger attending the slipping off of the chain from the handle, where the purpose of such evidence is to show why the brake was at certain times inefficient.—Rivers v. Bay City Traction & Electric Co., 164 Mich. 696.

¶ 1305. Plaintiff, an expert electric lineman employed by defendant received a shock and was injured while taking hold of a guy wire in making certain alterations on defendant's pole. The guy wire had become charged by reason of the fact that a live wire had become released from its pin in such a way as to permit said wire to be drawn against the brace supporting one of the arms. The wire rubbing against the brace destroyed the insulation, and the brace in turn carried the current to the guy wire. The pole in question was at a corner and the strain had a tendency to break the pins carrying the live wires. The guy wire in question had become charged upon two occasions previous, one of them about two weeks before the day of the injury. Defendant had been notified and sent a man to remedy the defect. No warning was given to plaintiff. Held, the court properly admitted evidence that the guy wire had become previously charged; that the repairs made before the accident were not made properly; and that the lines at the place of the accident were not originally properly constructed.—Huber v. Twin City General Electric Co., 168 Mich. 531.

¶ 1306. In an action at common law for the negligent death of a railway pump operator alleged to be due to the failure of defendant to furnish deceased with a place and machinery reasonably safe in which and with which to work, held that there was sufficient proof to show that there was no change in the condition of the machine from the time of the accident until the subsequent time referred to by witness so as to render the testimony of such witness as to the condition of the machine in the afternoon after the accident, in that a portion of deceased's clothing was found in the clutch, not erroneous.—Snowden v. Detroit & M. Ry. Co., 194 Mich. 87.

§ 64d. ——Master's knowledge of defects and inspection and repair.

Weight and sufficiency of evidence, see post § 65f.

¶ 1307. In a suit for personal injuries, it is proper upon the point of plaintiff's ignorance of the dangers of the machine in question, and defendant foreman's knowledge of the same, to introduce evidence looking to the impeachment of said foreman, who testified as a witness for defendant.—Molyneaux v. Bradley, Miller & Co., 167 Mich. 278.

¶ 1308. In an action for death of a servant through the bursting of a defective pulley, defendant's superintendent denied that he had said to a member of the coroner's jury that he knew of the defective condition of the pulley. A member of the jury then testified as to what the superintendent had said. Held, admission of such testimony as substantive proof of defendant's knowledge of the defect was reversible error.—Clark v. Goldie, 177 Mich. 653.

¶ 1309. Where a railroad company when sued for injuries caused by the defective condition of the handle-bar on a hand-car introduced testimony that the car was examined every morning and found to be safe, it was not error to admit in rebuttal contradicting testimony.—Greenfield v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 117 Mich. 307.

¶ 1310. Evidence that certain gaskets had been removed on account of deterioration was admissible in an action for personal injuries received from the escape of ammonia gas blown out of a pipe joint claimed to have been packed with an improper gasket, where it appeared that the gasket in question was of the same material, had been installed at the same time, and was subject to the same influences as the gaskets removed; as such evidence was material to the question of defendant's duty to inspect such gaskets from time to time to ascertain their condition.—Kaess v. Tivoli Brewing Co., 149 Mich. 371.

¶ 1311. In an action by a lineman to recover for injuries sustained by him through the breaking of a pole while he was engaged in erecting trolley wires, evidence tending to show that it was the universal custom of electric railroad companies to omit other inspection than that made by the repair crew, is admissible.—Lynch v. Saginaw Valley Traction Co., 153 Mich. 174.

¶ 1312. In a suit by plaintiff operator of a hotel elevator it is reversible error for the trial court to refuse to permit a duly qualified expert to state whether the defects in the elevator appliances in question could be discovered upon inspection; what his experience was as to inspection of braking and safety devices on the make of the elevator in question; as to the frequency of inspection necessary to make elevators safe and reliable; and as to the proper manner and method of such inspection.—Ammer v. Postal, 168 Mich. 405.

¶ 1313. In an action for wrongful death of an employee, through the falling of a heavy gate, it is not prejudicial error to permit witnesses to testify that the duty of keeping the gate in repair rested upon another employee where they have testified that it was no part of the deceased's duty, and the question upon whom the duty rested is immaterial.—Storrie v. Grand Trunk Elevator Co., 134 Mich. 297.

§ 64e. ——As to methods of work, rules and orders.

Weight and sufficiency of evidence as to methods of work, see post § 65g.
Weight and sufficiency of evidence as to rules and orders, see post § 65h.
Expert and opinion evidence as to modes and methods of work, see Evidence, VI.

¶ 1314. In an action for an injury to an employee while uncoupling moving cars it is competent to show what is usually and habitually done in running trains, because, if a railroad company permits a certain course of conduct it should not be allowed to hold its employees to the letter of its rules in order to shield itself from liability for what it has tacitly permitted.—Hunn v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 78 Mich. 513; Eastman v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 101 Mich. 597.

¶ 1315. A train dispatcher ordered a car, without knowledge of any defects in its condition, to follow another car which was in an unsafe condition. Had the second car been in good condition, and had the train crew of the front car obeyed the rule of the company as to torpedoing the track, the collision would not have occurred. Held, in an action by the conductor of the second car for personal injuries, that it was reversible error to permit experts to testify that the dispatcher's order was improper.—Welch v. Jackson & B. C. Traction Co., 154 Mich. 399.

¶ 1316. In a suit by a conductor against a suburban railway for injuries sustained in a collision alleged to be due to the negligence of defendant's train dispatcher, there was evidence that the method of giving dispatches was for the dispatcher to call the conductor on the telephone and have the conductor in the hearing of the motorman repeat out loud the orders back to the dispatcher. Held, it was competent for a third person, who overheard the plaintiff conductor repeat the dispatch in question, to testify as to its contents.—Meade v. Detroit, J. & C. Ry., 165 Mich. 489.

¶ 1317. Where it is customary for train dispatchers to find out whether their orders have been delivered to conductors and engineers, it is proper, in a suit to recover for failure to inform said trainmen of a washout, to exclude evidence of experts that it was good railroading to send such an order by message and without inquiring into the fact of its delivery.—Graham v. Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 168 Mich. 41.

¶ 1318. In a suit for personal injuries suffered by a conductor while uncoupling cars, it is proper to permit plaintiff, an expert railroad man of long experience and familiar with the customary mode of doing the work he was engaged in at the time of the accident, to testify that the business of the road could not be transacted if the conductor stopped to make a particular examination of each car, and that he did the switching in the customary way.—Van Leuvan v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 167 Mich. 355.

¶ 1319. Plaintiff's decedent, a brakeman, was dragged one hundred feet by a car, and was found lying by the track. He was picked up and carried four hundred feet to the depot, where, knowing that he was dying, he stated that the accident occurred by reason of his stepping in a hole in the scales on the track of defendant's railroad. Held, that evidence of these statements was admissible as a part of the res gestæ in a suit for the negligent killing of the decedent.—Gilbert v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 161 Mich. 73.

¶ 1320. In an action by an employee of a railway construction company for damages for personal injuries due to being brushed off a flat car, on which he was riding, by a push car which was on a siding and too near the main track, where it had been moved by small boys, the admission of evidence that leaving the car on the siding was not good railroading was not error, as, with several construction trains and trains carrying employees in operation, it was as important for defendant to exercise reasonable care to protect its employees from injury as though it had been a common carrier.—Adamski v. Michigan Ry. Engineering Co., 197 Mich. 561.

¶ 1321. In an action by a fireman on a locomotive for personal injuries sustained in a collision with another train evidence that after the collision the defendant company changed its rules in such a manner as to prevent a recurrence of such an accident, and discharged the operator at the station at which the accident occurred, and adopted a different method in stopping a train at that station than that by which it was attempted to stop the train of plaintiff on the night of collision, is inadmissible.—Moon v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 143 Mich. 125.

§ 64f. ——As to warnings and instructions.

Weight and sufficiency of evidence, see post § 65i.

Jury questions as to warnings and instructions, see post § 67l.

Negative evidence that warning was not heard, see Evidence § 80.

¶ 1322. In an action by an employee, evidence that the defendant employer notified other employees of the dangerous character of the common employment is inadmissible to rebut plaintiff's testimony that he was not so informed.—Fox v. Peninsular White Lead & Color Works, 84 Mich. 676.

¶ 1323. Plaintiff employee of defendant company was directed to leave his regular work, and help put a tram car which had jumped the track, back on the rails. He had no experience at this and received no instructions. He employed a crowbar and a ratchet lifting jack. In attempting to pry the car over with the crowbar, the car slipped and plaintiff was injured. Held, testimony that an inexperienced man would do the same as plaintiff was admissible to show the duty of defendant to give instructions.—Johnson v. Desmond Chemical Co., 156 Mich. 669.

¶ 1324. The plaintiff having been injured by a board flying from a buzz planer, it being alleged that the cause was the improper alignment of the knives, of which the defendants had notice, it is not error for the court to admit testimony of witnesses who had operated the same machine, as to similar injuries they had received, as tending to show the negligence of the defendants in not warning the plaintiff of the defects of the machine of which they had knowledge.—Wiers v. Shaw-Walker Co., 171 Mich. 324.

§ 64g. ——As to competency or negligence of fellow servants.

Weight and sufficiency of evidence, see post § 65j.

Directing verdict on ground of fellow servant's negligence, see post § 70c.

Jury questions as to negligence of fellow servants, see post § 67o.

¶ 1325. The opinion of a witness that if he had obeyed the orders of the yardman and taken a train out on the main track on an occasion when another train was overdue there he would have gotten into trouble was inadmissible, being a matter of opinion and purely speculative; such evidence would not prove that the railroad was negligent in employing a yardmaster, unless the fact be shown to have been brought to the knowledge of the officers of the road.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 46 Mich. 176.

¶ 1326. In an employee's action against his employer for injuries sustained by being caught in a machine, when the injury complained of is claimed to have resulted from obedience to a foreman's directions, evidence that the foreman was a man of intemperate habits, accustomed to get too drunk to do his work, and that he had been discharged for getting drunk but had been reinstated, is competent.—Kean v. Detroit Copper & Brass Rolling Mills, 66 Mich. 277.

¶ 1327. In an action for wrongful death caused by a collision of a hand car with a passenger train evidence that the foreman of a gang of section men running a hand-car was intemperate to an extent which unfitted him for his position is irrelevant where it is not claimed that he had been drunk or was under the influence of liquor on the day of the accident.—Hammond v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 83 Mich. 334.

¶ 1328. On an issue as to whether the operator of a cage or hoisting device in a coal mine was a competent and trustworthy engineer, as required by Pub. Acts 1905, No. 100, § 3, testimony of the habits of such operator as to the excessive use of intoxicants is admissible if such habits are shown to be within the knowledge of the mine owners, officers or agents, or are of so notorious a character that they should have known thereof.—Layzell v. J. H. Somers Coal Co., 156 Mich. 268.

¶ 1329. Evidence of talk among workman that the person in charge of the brake by which was controlled the hoisting and lowering of the cages in a mine was in the habit of lowering the cages at too great speed is not admissible upon the question of his incompetency in an action for injuries caused by his turning the brake the wrong way while the cage was moving at "natural speed," and letting the cage fall.—Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines, 115 Mich. 629.

¶ 1330. Evidence that the fellow-servants of an employee, in the retention of whom the master is alleged to have been negligent, had talked among themselves that he did his work improperly, is not admissible to prove general reputation for incompetency. —Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines, 115 Mich. 629.

¶ 1331. On an issue as to whether the operator of a hoisting device in a coal mine is a competent and trustworthy engineer, within the meaning of Pub. Acts 1905, No. 100, § 3, statements of the mine boss made on the night after the accident, relative to the competency and trustworthiness of said operator, are inadmissible.—Layzell v. J. H. Somers Coal Co., 156 Mich. 268.

¶ 1332. Upon a question involving the incompetency of an engineer to run an engine and the consequent liability of the master for his incompetency it is proper to show specific instances of incompetency.—Salo v. Martin, 187 Mich. 617.

¶ 1333. The negligence of a servant in a particular instance cannot be shown by testimony of his incompetency or carelessness on specific other occasions; but if it is also shown that the master knew of the cases or that they were of such a character and so frequent that he must have known of them, he, the master, may be chargeable with negligence in retaining such servant.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 46 Mich. 176.

¶ 1334. Where the only allegation of negligence connecting a locomotive engineer with the injury to plaintiff is that which charges that it was negligence for him to allow a fireman to run his engine, previous negligence on his part is unimportant unless he was also shown to have been negligent at the time of such injury.—Thompson v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 84 Mich. 281.

¶ 1335. In an action for personal injuries sustained by an employee by the falling of a rack suspended from the ceiling of the room in which he was working, where the defendant claimed that the falling of the rack was due to its use by the foreman for a purpose for which it was not intended, the use for which the rack was intended was determined not by ascertaining what was in the mind of the defendant's manager or servant who made the rack, but by determining for what the employees to whom it was furnished had a right to use it.—Corbett v. American Screen Door Co., 133 Mich. 669.

Jury questions as to contributory negligence, see post § 68.

Contributory negligence as ground for directing verdict, see post § 70d.

¶ 1336. In an action by a brakeman who was run over after falling into a ditch, while engaged in coupling in front of a moving car, it was error to exclude testimony of a custom of employees of defendant, in coupling cars, to go in front of moving cars. —DeCair v. Manistee & G. R. R. Co., 133 Mich. 578.

¶ 1337. In a suit by a plaintiff employee for injuries suffered from placing his hand upon the rear bed plate of a molding machine in looking under the same, it is proper for the purpose of showing that plaintiff exercised ordinary care to admit evidence of an established usage or custom among experienced operators of molding machines of placing their hands in a similar position. —Molyneaux v. Bradley, Miller & Co., 167 Mich. 278.

¶ 1339. Plaintiff's intestate, a motorman on defendant's car, was killed by a collision at a railroad crossing while attempting to stop his car. The negligence alleged was the failure of defendant to provide a brake as required by statute. Held, it was not error to permit the conductor to give his opinion that it would usually be safe for a motorman to begin, as did the intestate, to apply his brake at a point 150 feet from the crossing, such evidence being proper on the question of contributory negligence.—Rivers v. Bay City Traction & Electric Co., 164 Mich. 696.

¶ 1340. Plaintiff's intestate, a motorman on defendant electric railway's car, was killed by the car of a railroad crossing defendant's track. Defendant's rules required the intestate to stop his car thirty feet from the crossing to enable the conductor to go ahead and look for trains, and a sidewalk had been built alongside defendant's track for the conductor to walk on. Plaintiff introduced evidence to show that the sidewalk was so short it was necessary for his intestate to stop at a point less than thirty feet from the crossing in order to enable the conductor to board the walk from the rear vestibule of the car. Held, such evidence was admissible to show the intestate was not contributorily negligent.—Rivers v. Bay City Traction & Electric Co., 164 Mich. 696.

¶ 1341. In an action by an employee to recover for personal injuries due to a fall down a silo chute because of the fact that the doors in the side of the silo had been placed upside down and the levers in two of the doors, which, with other levers formed the ladder up the side of the silo, turned down as plaintiff's weight was placed thereon, the testimony of plaintiff that he went up the ladder to help the person in the silo if he needed any help, otherwise to see how near done the work was, was not inadmissible as a self-serving statement of reasons.—Van Driel v. Stevens, 200 Mich. 291.

§ 64i. ——Servants' experience and knowledge of dangers.

Admissibility of negative evidence as to knowledge of danger by servants, see Evidence § 80.

¶ 1342. A youth employed in a saw-mill was injured by the machinery before he had been there long. He had once before been employed in the same mill. Held, that in an action for the injury he could show the changes made in the arrangements of the mill in the interval between his terms of employment, as bearing upon his want of familiarity with them when hurt.—Huizega v. Cutler & Savidge Lumber Co., 51 Mich. 272.

¶ 1343. That the brightness of the surface of the trunnion and tires of the mill where an employee was injured rendered it impossible to tell that another adjoining mill was in operation when looking at them from a point having their surfaces in perfect alignment, is not material where the plaintiff testifies that he did not look at all at the mill on which he was injured, and he gave no attention to the place where he was working, although his attention had been directed to the fact that all the mills but one were running, and he selected that one without difficulty.—Walters v. Wolverine Portland Cement Co., 148 Mich. 315.

¶ 1344. Plaintiff, a miner, was injured by a hanging rock falling from the roof of the drift. There was no question of safe place to work involved except as it concerned said hanging rock, and none in regard to plaintiff's experience or lack of experience except in respect to his duty to discover the danger from this hanging rock. Evidence was introduced by plaintiff to show that he was inexperienced, and that when he began work defendant, as a part of the contract of hiring, assured him that the place was safe. Held, such evidence, though inadmissible, was not prejudicial to defendant.—Lewis v. Detroit Vitrified Brick Co., 164 Mich. 489.

Burden of proof and presumptions, see ante §§ 62, 63.
Admissibility of evidence, see ante § 64.
Questions of law and fact, see post § 67.
Directing verdict, see post § 70.
Judicial notice of mechanical facts and working experiences, see Evidence § 16.
Judicial notice of operating facts and experience on railroads, see Evidence § 14.

¶ 1345. Acting under the special instructions of the roadmaster of a division of defendant's road to cut a trolley wire which a street railway company had strung over defendant's track, the decedent climbed upon a box car, which had been run underneath the wire, and, while standing upon a stepladder which he had placed on top of the car, drew the wire down by placing one arm over it, and, with a pair of nippers, cut it until it parted. It was under tension and, by force of the recoil, threw him to the ground and caused his death. Verdict being for plaintiff, a reversal of the judgment and a new trial were ordered by the supreme court, the justices not agreeing in their reasons.—Walker v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 104 Mich. 606.

¶ 1346. A verdict for the plaintiff in an action under Act No. 104, Pub. Acts 1909, §§ 4110-4116, How. St., 2nd Ed., to recover for injuries sustained by a motorman in a collision between interurban cars, held sustained by the evidence.—Darling v. Grand Rapids, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 184 Mich. 607.

¶ 1347. In an action for personal injuries to a boy not quite 16 years old, evidence that the plaintiff's brother had stated that the plaintiff was 16 does not entitle the defendant to an instruction relieving it from liability based on an employment in violation of the statute, if the foreman who had employed him believed and had good reason to believe that he was 16, there being no evidence that plaintiff was asked his age, or that he knew of the representations said to have been made by his brother.—Beghold v. Auto Body Co., 149 Mich. 14.

§ 65a. ——As to existence of relation and scope of employment.

Admissibility of evidence as to existence of relation and scope of employment, see ante § 64a.
Jury questions as to existence of relation and scope of employment, see post § 67a.

¶ 1348. In an action by a mining employee against a mining corporation controlling the greater portion of the stock of and dictating the policies of another, the real employing corporation, which owned the mine, to recover compensation for injuries, evidence held insufficient to estop defendant from denying that it was employer operating the property.—Hannula v. Cleveland Cliffs Iron Co., 188 Mich. 543.

¶ 1349. In an action to recover for personal injuries received due to a defective ladder which plaintiff was climbing to put out a fire in a car, where it appeared that plaintiff, while on his way home from work saw a fire burning along the tracks of defendant company and among charcoal cars and sawdust cars and assisted in putting out the fire, evidence held to show that plaintiff was a mere volunteer and was not hired as a servant by defendant's officers.—Smedley v. Mashek Chemical & Iron Co., 189 Mich. 64.

¶ 1350. The relation of master and servant does not exist between a construction company engaged in doing work in a building occupied by another company, and a servant of the construction company at the time of his injury, where such servant has fixed hours, fixed wages paid by the hour and is not required to perform any service until he has eaten his dinner and has returned to work, and who, at the dinner hour, ascends a ladder in the boiler room on the premises for the purpose of eating his dinner upon the top of the boiler, as was his custom and that of other employees, and is injured due to the turning of a rung of such ladder, which causes his fall, but he is a mere licensee at the time of his injury.—Boner v. Eastern Michigan Power Co., 193 Mich. 629.

¶ 1351. Where plaintiff's duty was to trim the lamps of an electric light tower under the directions of defendant's foreman, who ordered him to ascend the tower for that purpose, the fact that both he and the foreman were informed by another employee, before ascending, that the lamps had been trimmed, would not render his ascent a matter outside of the performance of his duties.—Weiden v. Brush Electric Light Co., 73 Mich. 268.

¶ 1352. In an action by a hostler's helper in a railroad roundhouse against the company to recover damages for personal injuries sustained as the result of plaintiff, who had, during working hours, ridden on an excursion train to a fair ground, and had returned in the cab of the engine of such train, jumping from the engine to the ground while it was in motion, evidence held not sufficient to show that plaintiff was injured in the course of his employment.—Stornelli v. Duluth, S. S. & A. Ry. Co., 193 Mich. 674.

¶ 1354. Evidence held insufficient to show that plaintiff's employment was changed from a clerical one to the extra hazardous one of car checker.—Yost v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co., 166 Mich. 672.

§ 65b. ——As to cause of accident.

Proximate cause of accident, see also ante § 42.

Jury questions as to cause of injury, see post § 67b.

Directing verdict for failure to show cause of accident, see post § 70a.

¶ 1355. In an action for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by a defective brake on a hoisting derrick, plaintiff's testimony that the brake "gave way" is not destroyed by testimony on cross-examination that the engineer put his foot down and caused the brake to move and that is what caused the machinery to move, where it appears from other parts of the cross-examination that he did not mean to testify that after the brake had been set the engineer went and loosened it.—Bernard v. Pittsburg Coal Co., 137 Mich. 279.

¶ 1357. Where a jury after visiting a mill decides that it was the force of the suction of a dust collector that drew the plaintiff's hand into the machinery and injured it, the court will not reverse this finding, though the apparent weight of the evidence be against this conclusion.—Lund v. Sargent Mfg. Co., 158 Mich. 3.

¶ 1358. The plaintiff in an action for damages for personal injuries sustained by coming into contact with an unknown set-screw in a revolving shaft of a sawmill which forced his hand upon the saw is not bound to exclude the possibility that the accident might have happened in some other way than that claimed by him, but is only required to satisfy the jury by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the injury occurred in the manner contended.—Tankovich v. Indiana Min. Co., 187 Mich. 186.

¶ 1359. A brakeman who had entire charge of defendant's logging train, and who was responsible for the loading thereof, allowed a log to be loaded so as to project several inches beyond the side of the car, and was killed by the falling of a dead tree which stood so near the track that it was struck by the log. He had previously called the attention of defendant's foreman to the fact that the tree was standing too near the track, and his own attention was called to the projecting log. Held, that the improper loading was the proximate cause of the injury, and that defendant was not liable.—Powers v. Thayer Lumber Co., 92 Mich. 533.

¶ 1360. In a personal injury suit, the plaintiff cannot recover on the theory of the master's negligence in leaving certain holes in a dock open, where it appears that the injured person helped to cut the holes and there is no evidence that he was injured by reason of the presence of said holes.—Gehl v. Pittsburg Coal Co., 168 Mich. 285.

¶ 1361. In an action for wrongful death of a brakeman where the evidence showed that coal cars, boxed into the height of from two to two and a half feet, with a space of about fifteen inches in depth across the brake end of each car for the use of the brakemen, were loaded with lumber, which was piled to the height of from five to six feet from the car floor, and extended beyond the boxes, from eight inches at the top of the box to eighteen inches at the top of the lumber, and beyond the end of the car, projecting further as the height increased, until it left a space between the lumber of but fifteen inches on its surface, and the space reserved for the brakemen was thus partially covered, a jury was justified in finding that the cars had been improperly loaded.—Irvine v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 89 Mich. 416.

¶ 1362. Testimony of an injury to an employee's hand in a stamping machine, and that the stamp came down without pushing the lever upon two previous occasions to the knowledge of the defendant, is not sufficient to sustain a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff; there must be a specific showing of negligence on the employer's part.—Sargee v. Clark Can Co., 126 Mich. 508.

¶ 1363. In a suit by a locomotive engineer against the railroad company for injuries received in a collision alleged to have been caused by the negligence of a train dispatcher, evidence examined, and held to show that the dispatcher was not guilty of such negligence.—Veit v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 150 Mich. 358.

¶ 1364. Where plaintiff's intestate was killed by the falling of the roof of a building which defendant, his employer, was raising, and where there was no evidence of intestate's negligence or of the cause of the falling of the roof, it was held that the falling of the roof was of itself some evidence to go to the jury that the work of raising it was not done with ordinary care and skill.—Barnowsky v. Helson, 89 Mich. 528.

¶ 1365. Liability for personal injury by a boiler explosion claimed to have been due to overpressure was not established where it appeared that the defendant had furnished a safe boiler, a competent engineer, inspectors, repairers and testers, and that after being informed by the repairer that it was safe to work under a certain pressure, the safety valve was set below the lowest limit of safety and that the explosion occurred at a pressure below such lowest limit, and where experts testified that the safe working pressure was considerably higher than that at which the explosion occurred.—Beunk v. Valley City Desk Co., 133 Mich. 440.

¶ 1366. A master cannot be held negligent in not providing sufficient help to handle a heavy article which caused injury to a servant, where at the time of such handling other servants of the employer stood by and could have aided had it been thought necessary.—White v. Owosso Sugar Co., 149 Mich. 473.

¶ 1367. The log carriage in defendant's sawmill was operated by a lever standing upright at the side of the carriage some twelve inches from the saw-frame and some twenty-four inches from the carriage track. Said lever was placed in a vertical position to stop the log carriage and a clip fastened to a verticle standard was fitted upon said lever to hold it in place when the carriage was stopped. The clip itself was held in place by a strip of leather fastened to the same and to the saw-frame. Plaintiff's decedent, after the carriage had been stopped, climbed in between the same and the saw for the purpose of removing the door or covering which covered the saw. While in this position with his back to the carriage, the carriage started, pushed him into the saw and killed him. Plaintiff's theory was that the decedent, while engaged in removing the casing, accidentally touched the spring attached to said clip, thus releasing the lever and causing the carriage to be set in motion. No evidence was offered to sustain this theory and the lever might have been moved in several other ways. Said clip and lever had been used for several years and had never been accidentally released in the manner claimed by plaintiff. Held, plaintiff's evidence of defendant's negligence was too indefinite to support a verdict in his favor.—Johnson v. Jackson, 168 Mich. 149.

¶ 1368. A jury is warranted in finding that a switching crew was negligent in removing cars from a train made up except for the testing of the air and returning them without notice to the train crew, where a brakeman who went between a car and the tender to cut the air in order to repair a leak in the hose was injured by the shock, there being much evidence that the act was in the line of his duty, and that the switching screw had notice that the train crew was somewhere about the train since there was air in the hose on the standing cars, when the cars were restored to the train, and lights on the way car when it was disconnected.—Sonsmith v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 173 Mich. 57.

¶ 1369. Actionable negligence is not shown from the fact that the plaintiff was struck and injured by a falling roller, easily handled, which, while being carried down a stairway by two other employees, was allowed to slip and fall to the floor below, where the plaintiff was standing.—Seger v. Northwestern Cooperage & Lumber Co., 184 Mich. 48.

¶ 1370. That an employee was injured while removing a piece of broken material from a lath machine, as the result of his employer's negligence, held not established by the evidence.—Lydman v. De Haas, 185 Mich. 128, 8 N. C. C. A. 649.

¶ 1371. In an action by a factory employee for damages for personal injuries sustained as a result of his slipping against a swinging table used to carry poles against a saw which passed through a slit in the table and disengaging a worn notched lever fitting in the back of the table and holding it away from the saw when not in use, and falling on the saw, evidence held insufficient to show negligence upon part of the defendant.—Johnson v. Elm Cooperage Co., 188 Mich. 117.

¶ 1372. Evidence held insufficient to show actionable negligence on the part of defendant, in an action against a master to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death sustained by plaintiff's intestate, an employee, while hauling dirt to a certain dumping ground due to the wagon tipping over at such grounds.—Grochulski v. Porath, 196 Mich. 270.

§ 65d. ——As to tools, appliances and places.

Duty to furnish safe tools, appliances and places, see ante § 46.
Admissibility of evidence, see ante § 64b.
Instructions as to safe tools and appliances, see post § 71a.
Instructions as to safe place to work, see post § 71b.

¶ 1373. The fact that a scaffold, remaining after it had been built and used for carpenters, was supported on brackets instead of being supported by posts resting on the ground and that it would have been stronger so made, does not show a neglect of duty towards painters who undertook to use the scaffold without invitation to do so, it having proved strong enough for the carpenters.—Hoar v. Merritt, 62 Mich. 386.

¶ 1374. An electric light company in so stringing its wires that those of one circuit cross those of another so that a slight sagging of one wire will bring the two in contact, and in maintaining one as a live circuit while employees are set at work handling with bare hands the wires of the dead one so crossing those of the live circuit, is clearly negligent.—Kraatz v. Brush Electric Light Co., 82 Mich. 457.

¶ 1375. In action by an employee negligence on the part of the employer who owns an elevator cannot be predicated upon the fact that just after an accident, when the elevator has fallen without check thirty feet, parts of the machinery are found loose and out of place; there being no evidence that they were in such condition before, and the strain from the fall necessarily tending to injure the machinery.—Robinson v. Charles Wright & Co., 94 Mich. 283.

¶ 1376. The mere fact that a machine shown to have performed its accustomed work properly both before and after an accident failed to work on that particular occasion is not sufficient to justify the conclusion of negligence.—Redmond v. Delta Lumber Co., 96 Mich. 545.

¶ 1377. Negligence of the master in permitting a saw frame to become dirty and clogged so that it would not recede by the action of a counterweight after being raised in operation is not shown, where the evidence is that it was the assigned duty of the employee to keep it clean and that it frequently did become clogged by bark and dust.—Johnson v. Hovey, 98 Mich. 343.

¶ 1378. Plaintiff's intestate, a fireman in the employ of defendant, was killed by the bursting of a joint in a steam pipe. While the cause of the explosion was entirely speculative, it was plaintiff's theory that it was occasioned by a defect in the joint itself, and he introduced evidence to show that the joint had been leaking for a long time prior to the accident, and that afterwards a crack was discovered therein of such a character that it must have existed for some time. There was no evidence that the joint was improperly constructed, that the leakage in itself was a signal of danger, or that an inspection would have revealed the defect. Held, that defendant was not liable.—Voight v. Michigan Peninsular Car Co., 112 Mich. 504.

¶ 1379. In an action for wrongful death of a laborer through the sinking of a vessel upon which he was employed, which vessel is alleged to have been unseaworthy, evidence that the vessel was built in 1862, that some months before the accident she leaked so badly that she was allowed to fill and sink, that subsequently less than $100 worth of work was done on her, that she sat light in the water exposed to wind and sun for several months and that she sank without apparent cause on her first voyage only two-thirds loaded in smooth water and a light wind is sufficient to show that she sank because she was unseaworthy.—LaFernier v. Soo River Lighter & Wrecking Co., 129 Mich. 596.

¶ 1380. In an action for personal injury to an employee by the falling of a rack in the room in which he was working, by reason of the foreman's placing heavier and larger pieces of lumber on the rack than had ever been placed there before, the jury was warranted in finding that the foreman, who to get the pieces out of the way, ordered them placed in the rack, exercised a proper discretion and was using the rack for a purpose for which it was intended, and that the injury was due to a failure to furnish safe appliances and not to a misuse by a fellow servant of an appliance which was safe for the purpose for which it was intended.—Corbett v. American Screen Door Co., 133 Mich. 669.

¶ 1381. Failure to cover set-screws as required by Comp. L. 1897, § 5349, when required by the factory inspector, is evidence of negligence.—Sipes v. Michigan Starch Co., 137 Mich. 258.

¶ 1382. Testimony of one witness in an action for an injury sustained by an employee by coming in contact with a small saw on an equalizing machine, that he had seen hoods or other devices to cover saws on such machines in factories, but never saw them used in this state, made no case for the application of the rule that a manufacturer is required to adopt those inventions for the protection of his employees which are in ordinary use.—Journeaux v. E. H. Stafford Co., 122 Mich. 396.

¶ 1383. It was not negligence, for which a mill company could be held in damages, for such company to remove from the knives of its planer the hood and blowpipe, although an employee coming in contact with such knives, was injured; where it appeared that such hood and blowpipe were used merely for the purpose of removing the chips and dust, and there was no evidence that such was ever used for the protection of operators, or that planers are ever covered for such a purpose.—Erickson v. Cummer Mfg. Co., 140 Mich. 434.

¶ 1385. The evidence proves that the sheeting in the construction of a sewer was put in according to the directions and under the supervision of plaintiff's intestate, in an action against a city for the negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate by the caving in of the sewer; where every witness who gave testimony on that subject, save one, testified that the sheeting was so put in, and the witness who did not so testify stated in his testimony that he supposed defendant's foreman had charge and supervision of putting in such curbing, but later testified that plaintiff's intestate was one of two men who built the curbing, and that he did not know whether he had charge of the work or not, and that he did not know whose plan it was.—Salzwedel v. City of Adrian, 145 Mich. 280.

¶ 1386. Where a plaintiff is injured while operating a tram car, and seeks to recover on the ground of the defective condition of the brake, but offers no evidence of any specific defects in the car, and only gives conjectural and vague surmises as to the nature of the defects complained of, the court properly directed a verdict for the defendant.—Micari v. Monroe Stone Co., 154 Mich. 362.

¶ 1387. In an action for injuries to a servant resulting from the use of a "softhead" claimed to have been improperly tempered, testimony of an expert that by accurate tests he had determined there was temper left in the "softhead" by the defendant's servant, who manufactured it, was sufficient proof of negligence.—Potvin v. West Bay City Shipbuilding Co., 156 Mich. 201.

¶ 1388. Where plaintiff was injured while oiling a fan operated by a belt, and there was positive testimony that the injury was caused by a defective portion of the belt striking plaintiff's wrist and driving his hand into the fan, a verdict for plaintiff will not be disturbed as manifestly against the weight of evidence.—Cummins v. Boyne City Tanning Co., 177 Mich. 217.

¶ 1389. Where a servant was injured by the fall of an empty bucket, which was not being subjected to any unusual jar or strain, which was apparently due to it being defectively fastened to a hoisting apparatus, it is sufficient to support a reasonable inference that the accident was the result of the defendant's negligence in not properly securing the bucket.—Maki v. Isle Royale Copper Co., 180 Mich. 624.

¶ 1390. In an action by a mill employee for injuries sustained while oiling an overhead shaft, plaintiff's witnesses testified that the platform on which the oiler stood was about seven feet above the floor, and consisted of a single plank ten or twelve inches wide, supported on brackets placed at different heights and angles, so that it was inclined, and "wobbled" when in use. Defendant's witnesses testified that there were two boards, and that they were placed horizontally. Held, that there was evidence upon which the jury might find that the employer was negligent in the construction of the platform.—Zimmerman v. Detroit Sulphite Fibre Co., 113 Mich. 1.

¶ 1392. In an action by an experienced laborer for damages for personal injuries sustained by the falling of an overhanging bank in a gravel pit, evidence held insufficient to show negligence upon the part of the employer in not providing a safe place to work by barring down the bank.—Robbins v. Trebilcock, 188 Mich. 163.

¶ 1394. Plaintiff had worked for defendant as a night watchman for many years and was thoroughly familiar with its premises. The entrance on an alley to one of defendant's buildings was reached by three stair steps. Plaintiff approached the door from the inside of the building and could see it plainly. In attempting to put his foot on the first step to go down he reached too far and fell down the stairs. The alley was not lighted and the night was dark. Held, defendant was not guilty of negligence in failing to light the alley.—Moses v. Reo Motor Car Co., 165 Mich. 595.

¶ 1395. In occupations attended with great and unusual danger all readily attainable appliances known to science for the prevention of accidents must be used, and neglect to provide them is proof of culpable negligence.—Mather v. Rillston, 156 U. S. 391, 39 L. ed. 464, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 464.

§ 65e. ——As to railroad tracks, cars and equipment.

Care and diligence required of master, see ante § 33.

Duty to furnish safe tracks, cars and equipment, see ante § 49.

¶ 1396. Plaintiff, an engineer in the employ of the defendant railroad, was injured in a collision caused by a flat-car (which had stood upon a siding) running down upon the main line. There being nothing to show that the side track was not in proper condition, or that there was reason to fear cars running out, or that the company had not used ordinary care in placing the car upon the siding. Held, that the omission to provide the flat-car with brakes, or the side track with stop-blocks, was not actionable negligence.—Hewitt v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 67 Mich. 61.

¶ 1397. Evidence that draught rigging of a car was found to be defective after the accident in that it yielded too far on impact of coupling is insufficient to justify a finding that it was in the same condition when the car was put into the train, there being other evidence tending to show that the defect may have been caused by the force with which the cars came together on a first attempt to couple them at the time of the accident.—Perry v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 108 Mich. 130.

¶ 1399. A railroad cannot be charged with negligence for failing to make provision for the protection of persons near the track, from injury from caboose steps projecting fifteen inches, where it is shown that parts of the engines used projected more than fifteen inches though properly constructed. —Turner v. Detroit Southern R. Co., 137 Mich. 142.

¶ 1400. A railroad is not negligent in using a caboose with steps projecting fifteen inches from its side where such cabooses have been used for four years without accident and similar cabooses were in common use on other roads, and parts of the smallest engines in use on the road projected more than fifteen inches, and there is no evidence that it was so dangerous to use such cabooses that an ordinarily prudent employer would discard them.—Turner v. Detroit Southern R. Co., 137 Mich. 142.

¶ 1401. Negligence of a railroad company is sufficiently shown in an action for injury to a section hand caused by the derailment of a hand car, where it appeared that an open rack car had been loaded with mill refuse and that a short piece of hardwood flooring fell from the car and derailed the handcar which followed over the track a short time after the loaded car had passed.—McLean v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 137 Mich. 482.

¶ 1402. Where it appears that gravel, dropped from cars being moved in defendant railway company's yards, had formed in piles in and about the tracks, and had remained thus for a period of from two to four days, defendant is guilty of failure to maintain a safe place for its employees to work in, and is liable for such failure in a suit by a switchman who, while coupling a moving train, fell over one of said piles, and was injured.—Gillespie v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 150 Mich. 303.

¶ 1403. Plaintiff, a brakeman, was injured by striking a cattle chute three feet, eleven inches from the side track. Plaintiff testified that many other buildings were examined by him along the same railroad and were by varying distances farther from the track than the chute in question. Held, that since plaintiff gave only selected instances of building locations, a custom could not be inferred from this evidence that in good railroading all buildings were located farther from the track than the one in question, so as to entitle plaintiff to rely on that custom.—Carr v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 152 Mich. 138.

¶ 1404. Plaintiff's husband, a locomotive engineer employed by defendant, was killed while running his engine over an embankment across a ravine, said embankment having suddenly settled under the weight of the train, causing the derailment of the locomotive. There was evidence that there was a culvert running through the embankment ninety feet long and four feet in diameter; that for some years prior to the accident the wing walls of said culvert had disintegrated and a reservoir had been washed out at the outlet of the culvert; that the sand of the embankment had sifted through the disintegrated walls of the culvert and had been carried off by the water; that a large hopper-shaped hole had thus been formed in the embankment above the culvert, and that the roadbed had in this way been undermined. Held, a verdict for plaintiff under the death act was sustainable on the ground of defendant's failure to provide a safe roadbed and supply the proper inspection thereof.—Stolz v. Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 167 Mich. 300.

¶ 1405. Evidence in an action for damages for injuries sustained by an employee while operating the machinery of a railroad pumping station held sufficient to establish an inference of negligence on the part of the company in failing to furnish such employee with a safe place to work.—Snowden v. Detroit & Mackinac Ry. Co., 187 Mich. 140.

§ 65f. ——As to inspection and knowledge or notice of defects.

Duty to inspect, see ante § 53.

Instructions as to tests and inspection, see post § 71c.

¶ 1406. Where the declaration in an action against a railroad company alleged it to be defendant company's duty to see that its cars, on which plaintiff was a brakeman, were properly loaded with lumber, so as not to imperil the lives of its employees, and the testimony tended to show that they were so loaded as to increase the hazard of braking them, and in addition that no provision was made by defendant for their inspection, the jury was justified in finding that there was no inspection.—Irvine v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 89 Mich. 416.

¶ 1407. Defendant's locomotive inspector testified that, four days before the accident, he examined the left side of the fire-box, and that it was leaking badly; that he noted this fact in a book kept for that purpose, with an instruction that the fire-box be examined; and that it was the duty of one B. to examine it and see to its repair. B. testified that he made said examination, and stopped the water squirting from the mouthpiece on the left side, after which there was nothing to indicate that there was anything wrong; that he reported this repair, but did not, as was his duty, note on the book the fact of such examination. Held, that it was competent for the jury to infer that the inspector of engines was right in saying that there was a leak on the left side of the fire-box, and that a careful examination at that time would have disclosed a defective condition of the boiler, and prevented the accident.—Woods v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 108 Mich. 396.

¶ 1408. Comp. L. 1897, § 6313, requiring a railroad company to adjust, fill or block frogs so as to prevent employees getting their feet caught in them, imposes a duty to renew the blocking and to inspect the frogs frequently; the fact that they soon become dangerous again emphasizes this need and while a compliance with the usual custom tends to prove diligence, it is not necessarily the test of diligence.—Jones v. Flint & Pere Marquette R. Co., 127 Mich. 198.

¶ 1409. Negligence on the part of a railroad company in the matter of properly inspecting a wooden ladder leading to the top of a water tank, is not shown, in an action for damages from a fall occasioned by a slat of such ladder pulling loose; where it appears the ladder had been in use for upwards of 12 years, that it had been properly inspected six months prior to plaintiff's fall, and had been pronounced safe, and where the ladder broke under plaintiff because of a decayed portion hidden from ordinary inspection, and where there was no evidence as to the nature of the wood used, how long it might be expected to resist decay, or how fast decay, once started, would progress.—Nichols v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 145 Mich. 643.

¶ 1410. In an action for the death of plaintiff's intestate caused by the bursting of an idle pulley where it appeared that the pulley had been inspected and found to be in good condition less than three months before it burst, and there was nothing in the experience of mechanics which indicated the duty of a frequent inspection, it cannot be inferred that a person of ordinary prudence would have inspected the pulley oftener than once in three months unless there was testimony to show that more frequent inspections are customarily made by ordinarily prudent men in order that machinery may be safe for their employees.—Clark v. Goldie, 146 Mich. 303.

¶ 1411. Where the fireman of a repair train, sent out during a storm to repair washouts along the track, was killed as a result of the precipitation of the train into a washout alleged not to have been reported, circumstances which justify a finding that the washout had not been reported by the station agent to the train men, will not justify a finding that it had not been telegraphed to the station agent by the train dispatcher.—Graham v. Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 151 Mich. 629.

¶ 1412. Plaintiff was a foreman in charge of defendant railway's coal dock. Defendant's engines were loaded with coal at the dock by means of large buckets, which were hoisted full of coal from the dock to the tenders of the engines by power supplied by the engines, and were there unloaded by opening a door in the bottom of the buckets. This door was held closed by a catch or lip, which lip was supported by a spring and a wedge. Plaintiff was steadying with his hand a bucket of coal as it was being hoisted upon the tender. As the bucket struck the tender on the side, the wedge came out and the door flew open and caught plaintiff's hand. Plaintiff proved that when the buckets got out of repair he customarily wrote a letter informing the proper official, and that some of the buckets had got out of order and he had, two weeks prior to the accident, sent such a letter. But there was no evidence that plaintiff supposed the bucket in question was out of order. Held, it was immaterial whether plaintiff proved a notice to repair buckets in general, since plaintiff did not know that the particular bucket in question was out of order, and therefore no recovery could be based on defendant's alleged promise to repair.—Lukovski v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 164 Mich. 361.

¶ 1413. It cannot be assumed that an examination of the face of a quarry was made after a blast on a particular date, where defendant's foreman who customarily made such examination did not claim to have made it, but denied that any blast had been exploded on that date.—Druck v. Antrim Lime Co., 167 Mich. 154.

¶ 1414. Plaintiff, one of a gang of men employed by defendant to install a sprinkler system in the plant of a third person, was supplied with a stepladder to be used in the work. At the direction of his foreman he picked up a straight ladder belonging to said third person, and while using same was injured on account of its alleged defects. The alleged defects were such as could not be discovered by ordinary inspection. Plaintiff knew that his employer did not furnish the ladder and had not inspected it, or had opportunity to inspect it. He had no reason to think that the foreman had examined it otherwise than in the manner which plaintiff himself adopted. There was no evidence that the foreman was an inspector for the employer. Held, defendant was not liable for failure properly to inspect and supply safe tools.—Fellows v. Stevens, 170 Mich. 13. (Bird, J., dissenting.)

¶ 1415. Where it does not appear how oil came to be placed on a slide way in the defendant's factory, on which a night watchman fell and was injured, or that it was placed there with the former's knowledge, or had been there long enough to charge him with constructive notice, actionable negligence is not shown.—Meyer v. Grand Rapids Chair Co., 180 Mich. 604.

§ 65g. ——As to methods of work.

Methods of work in general, see ante § 52.
Admissibility of evidence as to methods of work, see ante § 64e.
Instructions as to methods of work, see post § 71d.

¶ 1416. In the absence of proof to the contrary, testimony that the general method of loading rails upon moving cars by gangs of men taken from section gangs, was the ordinary method of doing such work where the rails had been obtained from taking up old track, the adoption of such method was not shown to be negligence.—LaBarre v. Grand Trunk W. Ry. Co., 133 Mich. 192.

¶ 1417. Testimony, which when given its greatest force, tended only to show that when a driller in a stone quarry had his last hole so nearly completed that it was suitable for loading with dynamite, the loader gave such driller a stick of the dynamite for loading, and that the unfinished holes were left until after the explosion blast, and that all others were loaded by the man specially employed and qualified for that purpose, and which also showed that neither the foreman nor any other officer of defendant was ever in sight when a driller loaded a hole, failed to show a practice so open and notorious that drillers loaded holes, as to charge defendant with knowledge of it, and consequent ratification.—Kopf v. Monroe Stone Co., 133 Mich. 286.

¶ 1418. In an action against a mine owner for the death of pumpman employed in the mine, held that there was no evidence to show a custom of defendant of leaving its engine house and hoisting machinery without any one in charge during the hours between shifts while pumpmen were in the mine, nor was there any evidence to show that the employment of a particular brakeman was such as to leave him to infer the right to leave his post of duty at such times. —Williams v. Verona Min. Co., 149 Mich. 45.

¶ 1419. Plaintiff had been working as a regular miner in defendant's mine for about three weeks. A blast was exploded in the evening in the raise in which plaintiff was working. Next morning plaintiff's assistant did not appear to timber the roof of the place blasted. Plaintiff was directed to work in another part until noon, when he was directed with another to timber the blasted place. While so engaged, a quantity of ore fell in from the roof and injured him. Held, defendant could not be deemed negligent on the theory of a failure to adopt reasonably safe methods of work and to see that they were carried out.—Hosking v. Cleveland Iron Mining Co., 163 Mich. 588.

§ 65h. ——As to rules, orders and commands and compliance therewith.

Compliance with or disregard of rules, orders and commands as bearing on contributory negligence, see ante §§ 59 l, 59n.
Admissibility of evidence as to rules and orders, see ante § 64e.

¶ 1420. The production of a duplicate contract signed by a brakeman, in which he acknowledges the receipt of a copy of rules of the company, and agrees to abide by them, is prima facie proof that he had received and read such rules.—Fluhrer v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 121 Mich. 212.

¶ 1421. The production of authorities asserting that it was the duty of railroads to promulgate reasonable rules for the running of trains, was not sufficient to establish the fact that the defendant had been negligent in that respect.—Seccombe v. Detroit Elec. Ry., 133 Mich. 170.

¶ 1422. Evidence showing that an employee in the operation of a traveling crane "was to use all the care possible, to keep his eyes peeled for anybody that might be in the way, and if they were in the way to call out and warn them," is sufficient to show a discharge by the master of his duty to establish rules to warn employees of the movements of the crane, if such duty exists. —Ferry v. American Suction Gas Producer Co., 153 Mich. 266.

¶ 1423. Written rules of railroads cannot be treated as abrogated on testimony tending to show nothing more substantial than insubordinate and unreported criminal disobedience on the part of some of the employees.—Jones v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 168 Mich. 1.

¶ 1424. A written rule of the company forbidding an engineer to run his northbound engine on the southbound main of a double track is not annulled by a telephone message from the despatcher to the yard master stating that a certain train due at the time in question will not run on said southbound track but will detour by another line.—Jones v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 168 Mich. 1.

¶ 1425. In a suit for personal injuries suffered in a collision by plaintiff engineer in running his train engine north on the southbound main of a double track in violation of the printed rules of the railroad, evidence that yard engines and dummies were used on both mains in both directions unde the direction of the yardmaster when not on the time of regular trains, and when they were properly protected, and conflicting evidence that passenger and freight engines had done the same, does not by reason of custom give plaintiff the right to run his engine north to the roundhouse on the southbound track, where bulletins are kept posted and the engineers are required to read them before every trip; where there is no evidence that defendant's managing officers know of said violations of the rule; where a man is employed whose duty it is to instruct new men as to rules and bulletins, and where the plaintiff has known of said infractions of the rules and has failed in his duty to report them.—Jones v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 168 Mich. 1. (Blair and Moore, JJ., dissenting.)

¶ 1426. Plaintiff engineer before switching his train into the yards was informed by a switchman that No. 8, a southbound train on defendant's line, would not run over the line that night but would detour by another line. Plaintiff knew No. 8 was due and had the right of way. After placing his train in the yard he ran his engine on the way to the roundhouse out north on the southbound main of the double track in violation of the printed rules of defendant, whereupon it collided with No. 8, resulting in plaintiff's injury. The train dispatcher had sent out word that No. 8 would detour and had later changed his plan and sent No. 8 out on her regular track without sending out a message informing the yardmen of such fact. Had the plaintiff followed the rules in taking his engine to the roundhouse the accident could not have occurred. Held, the dispatcher's conduct did not constitute negligence.—Jones v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 168 Mich. 1. (Blair and Moore, JJ., dissenting.)

¶ 1427. The foreman of a gang of laborers employed by a railroad company to dig and load gravel called out as the train was about to start, "All aboard!" and one of the men, in attempting to jump on while the train was moving, lost his hold and was injured. He swore that he heard no order to board the cars, and went because the others went; and he knew that there was to be another opportunity of getting on the train. Held, that there was no evidence of defendant's negligence.—Novock v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 63 Mich. 121.

¶ 1428. The inference that a servant of a railway construction company rode on the outside of a way car in the performance of a duty for the company and under its direction could be legitimately drawn; where, in an action for injuries to him in a collision while so riding, it appears that the company's roadmaster, who was on the train, told plaintiff he had "better go inside"; to which plaintiff replied he "got up here to watch the tools" to see that none fell off, and that he had a good seat, whereupon such roadmaster said "all right, then."—Milbourn v. Arnold Elec. Power Station Co., 140 Mich. 316.

¶ 1429. Where the general manager of a drug company testifies that one Larkins had charge of the soda department under one Tabor, and that one of Larkins' duties was to see that the fountains were charged, there is sufficient evidence for the finding that Larkins represented the defendant in issuing an order to an employee to fill a tank.—McDonnell v. Central Drug Co., 170 Mich. 291.

¶ 1430. In an action by a hostler's helper in a railroad roundhouse against the company to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained while plaintiff was attempting to get off of an engine while it was in motion, evidence held insufficient to show that any invitation had ever been given by the engineer to the plaintiff to get on the engine to render help.—Stornelli v. Duluth, S. S. & A. Ry. Co., 193 Mich. 674.

¶ 1431. In an action by a hostler's helper in a railroad roundhouse against the company to recover damages for personal injuries sustained as the result of his jumping off the engine of an excursion train upon its return trip while such engine was in motion, and in which it was claimed by the plaintiff that he boarded the engine on its initial trip in response to what he thought was a request of the engineer, supposing there was something the engineer wanted him to do, that upon the return trip the engineer promised to let him off at the roundhouse, and, while slowing down, motioned him to get off, which he attempted to do while the train was moving at about ten miles an hour, evidence held insufficient to show any negligence on the part of the defendant.—Stornelli v. Duluth, S. S. & A. Ry. Co., 193 Mich. 674.

§ 65i. ——As to warnings and instructions.

Duty to warn and instruct, see ante § 54.
Admissibility of evidence as to warnings and instructions, see ante § 64f.
Jury questions as to warnings and instructions, see post § 67 l.
Instructions as to warnings and instructions, see post § 71d.

¶ 1432. A brakeman injured while attempting to couple cars supplied with double deadwoods, where by his own testimony he saw and recognized the danger, and attempted to couple the cars in the manner in which it should be done, cannot be said to have been hurt by reason of defendant's failure to instruct him how to make the coupling.—Fenlon v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co., 108 Mich. 284.

¶ 1433. The jury were warranted in finding that a mill company had not discharged its duty in taking reasonable precautions to keep the passageway back of the shears of its iron mill clear of scraps and in giving instructions to the young lads employed by it before setting them to work at these big shears, in an action for the death of one such lad caused by coming in contact with exposed cogwheels as he was attempting to pass over the obstructions in such passageway; where, it appeared that the passageway was narrow, and had an exit at one end only, that the gears and the other machinery were so exposed in such passageway that if the scraps accumulated on the floor, one passing through such passageway would be in danger of coming in contact with such cogwheels, that the boys so employed were instructed by the mill foreman to bind the scraps into bundles of fagots and pile them on the floor of such passageway to be gathered up by another employee, but that they were not instructed to keep the passageway clear at those points where the exposed cogwheels were.—McDonald v. Champion Iron & Steel Co., 140 Mich. 401.

¶ 1434. A mill company was not negligent in failing to tell its employee, who was injured while working at its pony planer, that a device connected with the machine was weak, and would not protect him from the knives as a hood would do, where, it appeared that such fact was evident, and there was nothing to indicate that he relied upon its strength in any way.—Erickson v. Cummer Mfg. Co., 140 Mich. 434.

¶ 1435. In a personal injury suit, recovery cannot be had on the theory of the master's failure to warn of the danger, where there is no evidence that the injured person was unaware of the dangers or that he was not warned, or that the failure to warn was the cause of the accident.—Gehl v. Pittsburg Coal Co., 163 Mich. 285.

¶ 1436. In an action by an employee of a stone crushing plant against the owner for damages for injuries sustained while in the performance of his duty in pinching down an empty car to the crusher, pursuant to custom, as a result of the carelessness of the engineer of a switching engine in the employ of defendant in bumping cars against such car, evidence held insufficient to establish that the workman was entitled to any special warning as to the movement of the switch engine.—Salo v. Martin, 187 Mich. 617.

§ 65j. ——As to competency and negligence of fellow-servants.

Liability of master for acts of fellow-servant, see ante § 55.
Admissibility of evidence, see ante § 64g.
Jury questions as to negligence of fellow-servants, see post § 67o.
Instructions as to acts of fellow-servants and duty to employ competent servants, see post § 71e.

¶ 1437. The use by an employee of a riveting "soft-head" which he knows to be defective is not conclusively negligent so as to bar recovery by a fellow-servant engaged in striking the soft-head where the evidence tends to show that the soft-head had been turned back as dangerous and defective but subsequently retained as the only one available and upon refusal of the employer to repair it.—Noble v. Bessemer Steamship Co., 127 Mich. 103.

¶ 1438. It cannot be held that a lineman's injury caused by the breaking of a pole upon which he was working arose from the negligence of his fellow-servants and therefore his recovery of damages from his employer was barred where there is no evidence that any of the linemen in defendant's employ at the time of the accident were employed in that capacity at the time the pole was set in the original construction of the road, or that they had any knowledge or means of knowledge of the original defect of the pole, except by taking it out of the ground.—Livingway v. Houghton County St. Ry. Co., 145 Mich. 86.

¶ 1439. In an action against a railroad company by an engineer for an injury caused by the negligence of a freight conductor, evidence that he was put on the list of conductors some eight months before the accident, after having been employed as brakeman for a longer period, and that he had once by mistake carried a passenger beyond his stopping place, and had for that reason spoken disparagingly of himself to his employer, does not by itself show him to be incompetent.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Dolan, 32 Mich. 510.

¶ 1440. In an action for wrongful death of an engineer due to the alleged incompetence of the yardmaster evidence that the latter was hasty and a very passionate man at all times, and that it took but little to excite him does not tend to show that he was unfit for the position; and the fact that he sent the train of which the deceased was engineer on the main track when a train was past due does not of itself imply negligence, although death follows.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 46 Mich. 176.

¶ 1441. A jury was justified in finding that a railroad company was negligent in failing to learn the intemperate habits of an engineer in its employ and in retaining him; where in an action by another servant for damages against such company, it appeared that the accident complained of was caused by the negligence of such engineer while he was in an intoxicated condition, that he had been in the habit of drinking intoxicating liquors to excess for a period of over nine months while in the employ of such company, and that no actual knowledge or notice of such habit ever reached any superior officer of such engineer.—Hilts v. Chicago & Grand Trunk Ry., 55 Mich. 437.

¶ 1442. There is no evidence of neglect consisting in incompetence of a fireman to transmit signals to the engineer and of an injury resulting from such incompetence: where plaintiff, a switchman, testifies that he gave a signal for a slow backing movement on the fireman's side which was responded to by an ordinary backing movement, but the engineer and the fireman both deny that any such signal was given, and the engineer further testifies that he could see and did see plaintiff on the inside of a curve on the fireman's side and was looking for signals while slowly backing, which testimony of the engineer and fireman is not contradicted or impeached.—Catlin v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 66 Mich. 358.

¶ 1443. The presumption that an employer has done his duty in selecting competent servants is overcome by proof that the servant was incompetent when employed.—Lee v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 87 Mich. 574.

¶ 1444. In the absence of evidence that care was exercised in selecting an employee who has been in the service only two or three weeks, proof that he was incompetent when employed need not be supplemented by proof that the employer knew of such incompetency.—Lee v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 87 Mich. 574.

¶ 1445. The fact that an employee, after operating machinery correctly for several months, forgot on one occasion and turned a brake the wrong way, thereby causing the fall of a mine cage and ensuing injury to a fellow-servant, has no tendency to show incompetency.—Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines, 115 Mich. 629.

¶ 1446. Due care on the part of a mining company in employing a boy seventeen years old to manage a brake by which the hoisting and lowering of passenger cages in the mine was controlled is shown by the facts that the machinery was simple and easily managed, and that the master mechanic, before employing the boy, made inquiries of the boy's father, who was a practical engineer, and was informed that the boy had had two years' experience in managing the brake at another mine, where the duties of the brakeman were more difficult, and that he was capable of doing the work which the company required.—Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines, 115 Mich. 629.

¶ 1447. In an action for negligent death evidence that the head sawyer had worked up through various positions in a saw mill during twelve years' service and had been recently appointed from the next lower position does not tend to show negligence in the selection of a competent fellow-servant.—Kellogg v. Stephens Lumber Co., 125 Mich. 222.

¶ 1448. Negligence in the selection of a fellow-servant in the person of a head sawyer is not made out by testimony that slabs accumulated on several occasions to the knowledge of the foreman, that the sawyer looked around at the tally board, and that half the time the sawyers were talking about hunting ducks, where there is other testimony going to show his entire competency and carefulness in the work.—Kellogg v. Stephens Lumber Co., 125 Mich. 222.

¶ 1449. Testimony that the conductor on an electric street car which while backing up collided with another car, was slow in ringing bells and stopping his car; that he got excited and gave wrong signals; that he was too short to reach the bell cord without standing on his tip toes, but that he was not known to have had an accident, and that the witnesses testifying had not reported him as incompetent, failed to raise any presumption that the defendant knew or ought to have known of the conductor's incompetency or that it should have removed him if it had known of such facts.—Seccombe v. Detroit Elec. Ry., 133 Mich. 170.

¶ 1450. Where a servant in charge of a traveling crane was shown to have been in defendant's employ for a period of more than two months, during which he had operated the crane some two dozen times, and it further appeared that he had been familiar with machinery before entering defendant's employ, and that upon the happening of the accident he did what he should have done to avoid further injury, there is sufficient evidence to establish his competency, the accident having resulted from the lapse of memory not inconsistent with skill and competency.—Ferry v. American Suction Gas Producer Co., 153 Mich. 266.

¶ 1451. Plaintiff, a fireman employed by defendant, was injured in a collision and sought to recover on the ground that defendant's engineer with whom he worked was incompetent. The evidence showed that said engineer had continued in defendant's employ for a year and shown himself fairly competent. Plaintiff introduced evidence to show that plaintiff on one occasion overloaded his fire with coal and upon another occasion failed to shake down the fire at the proper time and offered such evidence to prove the engineer's incompetency in failing properly to instruct plaintiff. There was further evidence that the engineer on another occasion ran past a station and exposed his train to danger of collision. It appeared, however, that this act on his part was necessary in order to back his train upon the siding. Held, the evidence wholly failed to establish defendant's negligence in failing to employ a competent engineer.—Larry v. Detroit & M. Ry. Co., 167 Mich. 380.

¶ 1452. That a master employed an incompetent boy to assist a servant who was injured through his negligence is not shown by evidence that the boy without the knowledge of the master occasionally smoked cigarettes, and laughed and giggled while at work.—Jackson v. Schillinger Bros. Co., 182 Mich. 504, 7 N. C. C. A. 576.

¶ 1453. The incompetency of a common laborer assisting a mine trammer is not established by evidence that he was a poor worker, "didn't take to his work well" and that he smoked cigarettes.—Sabela v. Newport Min. Co., 184 Mich. 676.

§ 65k. ——As to assumption of risk.

Doctrine of assumption of risk, see ante § 56.
Jury questions as to assumption of risk, see post § 67q.
Directing verdict on ground of assumption of risk, see post § 70b.

¶ 1454. Plaintiff, who was experienced in saw-mill work, fell from a ladder in defendant's mill, where he had been engaged for a month or more firing a boiler. The ladder, which was intended as a means of reaching the top of boiler, consisted of strips of wood nailed upon a wooden post or stanchion, which supported the wall encasing the boiler, and which extended a foot or eighteen inches above the brickwork. The sawdust carrier passed over the boiler, and sawdust scattered upon the top of the boiler ignited. Plaintiff testified that the night watchman told him to take a broom, hurry up the ladder, and sweep it off; that he took the broom in his right hand, and went up the ladder; that, when he reached the top of the post, he thought it extended farther up; that it did not extend up far enough for him to land on the boiler; that it was dark, and he could not see, and that he fell, and was injured. He further testified that he had seen the post, but never noticed how high it was, and that on the occasion of the accident he knew that he had reached the last slat, but was feeling for the post, which he supposed went higher. Held, that this was not a case of latent danger, but of one which was apparent to the casual observer, and which defendant had every reason to suppose was known to plaintiff.—Lamotte v. Boyce, 105 Mich. 545.

¶ 1455. The assumption of risk by a servant engaged in applying anti-slip compound to a pulley is not negatived by evidence that he advised the foreman to have the pulley tightened and the foreman promised to do so where it is not shown that the proposed repair would have done away with the necessity of applying the compound.—Cantwell v. John Brennan & Co., 125 Mich. 349.

¶ 1456. Assumption of risk is established by evidence that the deceased was killed while attaching a signal wire on the slippery roof of a shed in close proximity to two live wires of high voltage, that he knew of the danger and avoided it until he slipped on the roof and was thrown against or caught hold of the live wire.—Davis v. Port Huron Engine & Thresher Co., 126 Mich. 429.

¶ 1457. An employee tending pulp shakers in a starch factory after three days' work assumes the risk of injury caused by slipping on a wet floor and inserting his foot in a box 17 inches high containing a screw conveyor which he was compelled in his work to step over in going from one shaker to another, where his own testimony shows some familiarity with machinery and the nature of his work was explained to him.—Storrs v. Michigan Starch Co., 126 Mich. 666.

¶ 1458. The operator of a chicory grinder assumed the risk of personal injuries and had no cause of action against his employer; where, in an action for the loss of an arm caught in the gearing of such grinder, it appeared that the exposed gearing was open to view and did not escape the observation of such operator; even though it appeared that a previous fire had disarranged the apparatus of the mill so that a block was substituted for the box formerly used as a step for the operator of the grinder to reach the feed attachment above the rolls and belt, and that such block, while plaintiff was standing thereon, tipped, causing plaintiff's arm to come in contact with the rapidly moving belt resulting in the injuries complained of.—Minnie v. Mueller, 140 Mich. 3.

¶ 1460. The evidence on plaintiff's case alone is sufficient to show that a servant by trade a metal polisher but who had worked at logging for some weeks and was at the time working for the first day as a chainman at the foot of a rollway, knew the danger of the bank of logs becoming insecure in course of the work and of the risk of their falling when a spiked skid was removed whose spikes rested in the top logs, where in the course of his previous work he had been daily at and within sight of the loading operations whereby logs were banked by use of the skids, and where at the time he was killed the bank had become shaky and visibly so to any one and he tried to carry away the skid for the purpose of strengthening the bank or pile in response to directions telling him that it was shaky; and though he was not heard to have received any instructions but where there was ample opportunity for them to have been given without any of the witnesses having heard it.—Carnes v. Guelph Patent Cask Co., 141 Mich. 23.

¶ 1461. In an action for personal injuries sustained through a bolt or piece of slab being caught upon a saw and thrown forward with great force and striking the plaintiff, the servant must be held to have assumed the risk of his employment where it appears that he had joined the ends of the belt with rivets as directed by the foreman, although he intended to fasten it by lacing, but there was no lacing material at hand, and he thereafter continued the work, there being no evidence of a lack of knowledge of the manner in which the belt was fastened, nor any representations made to him to lead him to suppose that the belt would be fastened in any other way than it was.—Eligh v. Goldie, 143 Mich. 596.

¶ 1462. A boy seventeen years old of more than usual intelligence cannot recover in an action for personal injuries sustained by him while engaged in feeding and operating a slitting machine in defendant's factory on the theory that it was the duty of defendant to have instructed him how to do the work safely on account of his youth and especially to have instructed him not to replace the box coverings while the machine was in motion when the evidence shows that he had worked at the machine three weeks, that it was not a complicated one and the dangers were apparent.—Hess v. Escanaba Woodenware Co., 146 Mich. 566.

¶ 1463. In an action for personal injuries sustained by a person engaged in digging a trench to lay water pipe by the caving in of the sides there can be no recovery where the evidence shows that the trench was about seven feet deep, and about three feet wide at the top, that the side walls were frozen to a point three feet or more from the top, and that the plaintiff had been engaged in this work for three weeks; there being no latent danger in the fact that the frozen earth might cave in, and if there was it was a risk assumed by him, being as apparent to him as to any one else.—Hodgson v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 146 Mich. 627.

¶ 1464. In an action by a servant for personal injuries caused by being caught on a revolving shaft, where the evidence showed that plaintiff was about 18 years old, had been employed in the shipping department which included cutting the boards from which crates were made for 15 months before the accident, and that the plaintiff as helper had frequently and for a long time assisted in sawing crating material under a competent operator, and was put in charge of the saw and had done this work for at least two weeks before the injury it was held that the risk connected with the work was assumed by him, and that the danger of being caught on the shaft from which the saw was driven was apparent.—Hertel v. Safety Folding Bed Co., 149 Mich. 223.

¶ 1465. Where a carpenter foreman, after completing work proper for a carpenter in the wrecking of a building, was directed by the owner to remove steel beams which he claimed was the work for a steel man, with full knowledge of the weight of the beams and that the handles of the derrick used for lowering the beams were defective, ordered one of the workmen to take one of the cranks off, using a rope as a brake instead, and, while lowering the beam the other handle broke, causing the beam to fall and pull him, while hanging to the rope, upon the cogwheels and injure him, held that he assumed the risk of the employment.—Dams v. Vinton Co., 189 Mich. 12.

Jury questions as to contributory negligence, see post § 68.

Directing verdict on ground of contributory negligence, see post § 70d.

¶ 1466. The fact that laborers talk, laugh and sing while employed in work involving danger does not necessarily indicate that they are careless or negligent.—Smith v. Peninsular Car Works, 60 Mich. 501.

¶ 1467. The fact that upon switch-engines switchmen ride standing upon the platform provided for that purpose in front of the engine has no tendency to prove that they are justified in riding in a sitting position upon the cow-catcher of a road-engine.—Glover v. Scotten, 82 Mich. 369.

¶ 1468. Where the testimony of one who was injured by a saw's failing to operate in the usual manner, that is, to drop back through a slot in the table when not in use, showed that if he had looked before the accident he would have seen the saw, and thus could have avoided putting his hand over it, held, that he was contributorily negligent.—Johnson v. Hovey, 98 Mich. 343.

¶ 1469. A declaration for a personal injury averred that plaintiff, a freight brakeman, attempted to make a coupling of a car that had been kicked upon an unballasted siding; that he was ignorant of the condition of the siding, and could not see it, it being a dark and cloudy night; that plaintiff took two or three steps along on the ties, and while in the act of coupling said kicked-off car to another car, he being at the time between the two cars, he stepped with the train between the rails, and, instead of stepping upon the earth or a tie, as he expected, stepped between a couple of ties, and was tipped over, his feet falling unexpectedly over a foot, causing him to lose his balance, his control over his equilibrium and his body and limbs, and his right arm was caught between the two deadwoods of said car, and crushed. Plaintiff's testimony showed that the cause of the injury was his act in placing his arm between the deadwoods, where it could be and was caught when the moving car came back against the stationary car; that the movement by which his arm was so placed was not involuntary; that he was not thrown and did not stumble into this position; that he stood with his arm against the stationary car, in a position at that time discovered by him, and waited for the moving car to come against it, and the instant it did so his arm was caught. Held, that plaintiff's testimony failed to show either that he was in the exercise of due care, or that the unballasted condition of the track caused the injury in the manner complained of.—Mueller v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 105 Mich. 487.

¶ 1470. An employer cannot be held liable for injuries to a boy twelve years old, resulting from his falling against uncovered cogwheels during a scuffle with a companion, on the ground that he was too young to be placed at work in the vicinity of uncovered machinery, where it appears from his own testimony that he was familiar with the construction of the machines, and was fully aware of the danger.—Borck v. Michigan Bolt & Nut Works, 111 Mich. 129.

¶ 1471. An experienced miner who voluntarily stepped into a car for the purpose of barring down ore, when the danger of doing such work was apparent because of the danger of being struck by the ore when it started to run, was guilty of contributory negligence and assumed the risk of coming in contact with an electric trolley wire over the car, it appearing that the defendant had provided suitable and safe places for its employees to stand in barring down the ore.—Leppala v. Cleveland Iron Mining Co., 122 Mich. 633.

¶ 1472. In an action for wrongful death of a brakeman, testimony of the engineer, that, after throwing the switch and signaling the engineer the deceased disappeared behind the moving car and was not seen alive again, is open to the presumption that he attempted to cross the track and does not show necessarily that he was guilty of contributory negligence or breach of the company's rules by walking on the track ahead of the moving car.—Jones v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 127 Mich. 198.

¶ 1473. A switchman is not guilty of contributory negligence in getting on the side of a freight car and attempting to move to the rear, where the testimony shows that he could not easily get to the rear at once and that it was too dark to see a pile of lumber piled too close to the track.—Bradburn v. Wabash R. Co., 134 Mich. 575.

¶ 1474. In an action for personal injuries caused by a descending elevator crushing the foot of the complainant there can be no recovery where the evidence shows that the servant was perfectly familiar with the surroundings and stood waiting for the elevator and was talking with a friend, and she stood with the ball of her foot upon the floor, but a part of her foot extended over into the elevator shaft.—Roberts v. Sanitas Nut Food Co., 142 Mich. 589.

¶ 1475. The presumption that a brakeman, killed between a cattle chute and a passing car, was in the exercise of due care in making the coupling at the time of the accident, is negatived, where the evidence shows that he was directing the movement of the train in making the coupling, that it was midday and there was no obstruction to his view, that he was on the ground and had full control of his movements, was familiar with the surroundings and with a casual glance could have seen the danger, and where no reason is shown for his getting between the chute and the car which crushed him.—Wilson v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 145 Mich. 509.

¶ 1476. A person employed in the packing department of a factory engaged in the production of calcium carbide is not guilty of contributory negligence in permitting a plumber and steam-fitter, not subject to his control, to break a steam pipe and allow water to come in contact with calcium carbide, causing an explosion, where there is no evidence that he knew what such steamfitter was doing, or that he had any warning of the danger.—Charron v. Union Carbide Co., 151 Mich. 687.

¶ 1477. Where plaintiff, a brakeman, has passed a given station a dozen times or more, and had opportunity to notice the location of buildings along the track, and knows it is his duty to familiarize himself with the location of such buildings, the evidence is conclusive that, by using reasonable diligence, he would see a cattle chute located three feet eleven inches from the track, and plaintiff cannot recover for injury due to striking his body against said chute.—Carr v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 152 Mich. 138.

¶ 1478. The deceased, in charge of defendant's electric generating station, was killed by coming in contact with the lead wires, while attempting to get a rubber ball out of the pit in which the generating wheel was suspended. The evidence showed that the deceased knew of the presence of the lead wires in the pit; that said wires went to the switchboard; that they carried a dangerously high voltage; that he had been warned not to touch them either in or out of the pit; and that his duty did not call him to invade the pit in any way at any time, or to touch the machine except to oil the journals when it was running. Held, deceased was contributory negligent and his widow could not recover for his death.—Sweezo v. Cheboygan Electric Light & Power Co., 166 Mich. 25.

¶ 1480. A verdict in favor of the plaintiff in an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, for the death of a switchman, held not against the weight of the evidence.—Walsh v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 185 Mich. 177.

¶ 1481. In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act to recover damages for injuries sustained by reason of defective facings on the brake of a certain handcar preventing the car being stopped properly, where there was evidence showing that the car when running at a certain rate of speed could not be stopped by application of the brake within a certain number of feet, but no evidence tending to show within what distance the car could be stopped with brakes equipped with proper facings, held that there was no proper basis for a finding of negligence on the part of defendant or any of its servants operating the car at the time of the accident.—Miller v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 196 Mich. 297.

¶ 1482. In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act by a car repairer to recover for personal injuries sustained while engaged in repairing a defective car drawbar, evidence examined and held that plaintiff was precluded from recovery by having assumed the risk incident to the employment in which he was engaged when injured.—Gaines v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 193 Mich. 398.

¶ 1483. Even though plaintiff depended upon inference to establish the main fact in his case, the question whether or not that inference was sufficiently rebutted by direct testimony in defendant's favor was for the jury, and uncontradicted testimony to the contrary is not conclusive, the rule being different from that where the defense consists of a distinct fact, not inconsistent with plaintiff's proofs.—Woods v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 108 Mich. 396.

¶ 1484. Where the evidence of the plaintiff on a material point in an action for personal injuries to a servant is met by that of the defendant, the issue is for the jury.—Scoop v. W. H. White Co., 182 Mich. 539.

¶ 1485. That caustic soda will destroy the eye by burning when brought in contact with it cannot be held as a matter of law to be matter of common knowledge.—Dascho v. Michigan Alkali Co., 163 Mich. 612.

¶ 1486. The question of what was the gauge of a railroad track at the time of an accident is one for the jury.—Anderson v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 168 Mich. 207.

¶ 1487. Where a plaintiff is injured while performing his duty of shifting a machine belt, it is proper to submit to the jury, as an element establishing defendant's liability, evidence that the plaintiff's physical strength was insufficient for the task.—Lehto v. Atlantic Min. Co., 152 Mich. 412.

¶ 1489: Where conflicting evidence is presented as to whether an employee was working for a corporation or for an independent contractor, the question held properly submitted to the jury.—Druck v. Antrim Lime Co., 177 Mich. 364.

¶ 1490. Whether an employee was in his employer's service at the time of an accident is a question for the jury, when depending on conflicting testimony.—Stetson v. Mackinac Transp. Co., 182 Mich. 355.

¶ 1491. In an action by an employee for personal injuries due to a fall down a silo chute owing to the fact that the doors in the silo had been placed upside down and the levers in two of the doors which formed part of the ladder up the side of the chute turned down as plaintiff's weight was placed upon them, it was a question for the jury whether plaintiff was acting within the scope of his employment at the time of the injury where only 15 or 20 minutes' work remained to be done in filling the silo and all the doors were on and plaintiff's son was in the silo and did not need any help and plaintiff ascended the ladder to help his son, if he needed any help, otherwise, to see how near the work was to being done, and, as soon as the work was done, the machine was to be moved to a neighbor's where plaintiff was to assist in the work.—Van Driel v. Stevens, 200 Mich. 291.

¶ 1492. Whether a hostler employed in cleaning the ash pans of locomotives is a shopman within the meaning of Act No. 104, Pub. Acts 1909, How. St., 2nd Ed., §§ 4110-4116, held a question for the jury.—Boesler v. Copper Range R. Co., 184 Mich. 430.

¶ 1493. It is a question for the jury whether a plaintiff might, from the nature of his employment, reasonably assume that he was to use a certain dangerous machine.—Marklewitz v. Olds Motor Works, 152 Mich. 113.

§ 67b. Jury questions as to cause and manner of injury.

Evidence as to cause of injury, see ante § 65b.

¶ 1494. Whether an injury from the kick of a horse which ran away while being driven was due to the absence of a check-rein is for the jury to determine.—Hoffman v. Adams, 106 Mich. 111.

¶ 1495. Whether the inference suggested by plaintiff's theory as to the cause of an explosion of nitroglycerine, whereby her intestate had been killed, was the correct one, or whether it was sufficiently rebutted, was a question for the jury, upon testimony that the explosion occurred a few hours after an attempt had been made to change the method of conveying the partially finished compound, by employing for the purpose a rubber hose attached to a tank, that upon the plan's appearing to be impracticable, the hose had been permitted to remain attached to the tank but with the faucet shut off, and filled with so much of the compound as failed to escape at the open end, and that the compound contained acids which would generate gases and cause an explosion, and where the testimony in rebuttal was that nitroglycerine explodes at 380° Fahrenheit, and that hose of the size employed would not stand the pressure occasioned by the generation of that degree of heat.—Schoepper v. Hancock Chemical Co., 113 Mich. 582.

¶ 1496. An employee of a photographer was injured by an explosion of a substance given him by his employer for flashlight powder, the evidence showing that the ordinary components of flashlight powder are not explosive, either separately or in combination. Held, that whether some explosive substance was negligently permitted by the employer to be mixed with the powder, or whether the explosion was due to some other cause, or whether the flashlight powder itself was explosive, were questions for the jury.—Heath v. Calkins, 157 Mich. 288. (Grant, Ostrander and Brooke, JJ., dissenting.)

¶ 1497. In an action by an employee operating a spoke lathe for personal injuries sustained through stumbling and having his arm cut off in the machine, which was negligently started by the foreman while the employee was oiling it, causing the chips and sawdust to fly into his face, the question of proximate cause is for the jury and a verdict for the plaintiff will not be set aside.—Wellihan v. National Wheel Co., 128 Mich. 1.

¶ 1498. Where plaintiff testifies that in looping up a belt to keep the main shaft from burning it, he was drawn into the shafting and injured; that he was just reaching to touch the belt, but had not yet touched it; and that the ends of a rope pulley were hanging from the shaft and plaintiff felt these grip him and draw him into the shafting,—there is a question for the jury whether the contact with the said rope caused the accident.—Trombley v. McAfee, 152 Mich. 494.

¶ 1499. The question as to whether or not the use of uninsulated wire was the proximate cause of injury to a telephone lineman is one of fact for the jury.—De Kallands v. Washtenaw Home Tel. Co., 153 Mich. 25.

¶ 1500. Where, in an action for injuries sustained while operating a stamping press, defendant's theory that the injury was caused by the machine repeating, was supported by the evidence of several witnesses, the trial judge cannot, upon his judgment as to the mechanical possibility of the machine repeating, illustrated by the operation of the machine before him, determine as a matter of law that the machine could not repeat.—Clemens v. Gem Fibre Package Co., 153 Mich. 496.

¶ 1501. Plaintiff was injured by falling into a chute or raise while employed in a mine. There was conflicting evidence as to whether a light customarily kept burning at the chute, was out on the occasion in question. Held, that whether the absence of such light was the proximate cause of the accident, was a question for the jury.—Kaukola v. Oliver Iron Mining Co., 159 Mich. 689.

¶ 1502. Plaintiff was lying on a pile of blocks, in removing them from an elevator shaft, and in that position was near the revolving coupling of a line shaft. Plaintiff testified that he slipped off the pile, and into a projecting bolt in the coupling, and was injured. Evidence was introduced that plaintiff stated before the trial that he did not know how he was injured. Held, the question of the manner of his injury was for the jury.—MacDonald v. Freeman Mfg. Co., 160 Mich. 380.

¶ 1503. The question of whether a "flyback," injuring plaintiff, an edgerman in defendant's mill, was caused by failure to keep the edging machine in repair, is for the jury when there is some evidence in support of the theory, although defendant's testimony may show that it might have been caused in other ways.—Cousineau v. Embury, 171 Mich. 28.

¶ 1504. Where a saw mill company employs an ignorant and inexperienced machinist to run the machinery and fails to take proper precautions for guarding it, and such employee is not informed of the existence of a set screw in a revolving shaft which he is oiling, and stands closer to it and away from the saw and is injured by something knocking his hand against the saw, the question as to whether the proximate cause of the injury was the set screw striking his hand while engaged in oiling the shaft and knocking it against the saw is for the determination of the jury.—Tankovich v. Indiana Min. Co., 187 Mich. 186.

¶ 1505. In an action by an employee of a railway construction company to recover for personal injuries due to being brushed off a flat car, on which he was riding, by a push car which was on the siding and too near the main track, where there was expert evidence that in the operation of railroads it was the custom to set push cars, unattended by men, off the track, or, if left on the track, to securely chain them, and it appeared that small boys had been accustomed to playing on the siding and that the car was moved in the dangerous position by small boys, held that it was a question for the jury whether defendant had furnished plaintiff with a reasonably safe place to work and whether the proximate cause of the injury was the failure to either remove the car from the siding or securely block or chain the wheels.—Adamski v. Michigan Ry. Engineering Co., 197 Mich. 561.

§ 67c. ——To railroad employees.

¶ 1506. Circumstantial evidence that the deceased brakeman was found within a few feet of a frog, blocked defectively, that his foot was struck by the wheel of a car, that eyelets missing from his shoe were found within a few inches of the frog, is sufficient to leave to the jury as to whether death was due to his foot catching in the frog.—Jones v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 127 Mich. 198.

¶ 1507. The question whether the negligence of an assistant roadmaster in charge of a train, in unduly hastening the unloading of rails from a moving train, was the cause of an accident to one of those at work in unloading, was one of fact for the jury.—LaBarre v. Grand Trunk W. Ry. Co., 133 Mich. 192.

¶ 1508. In an action for the negligent killing of a railroad switchman claimed to be due to defective blocking, there was testimony that when decedent was found after the accident his foot was firmly wedged in the space between the guard rail and the main rail, the sole and heel being pressed down flat; on the other hand, there was evidence that the decedent admitted, prior to his death, that he slipped from the foot board of a locomotive and got caught under the wheel. Held that, notwithstanding such admission, the question of the proximate cause of the accident was for the jury.—Parker v. Union Station Ass'n, 155 Mich. 72.

¶ 1509. Plaintiff, a station agent of defendant railway, was injured by a conductor of defendant while they were engaged in unloading a freight car. There was evidence that the conductor was intoxicated. Held, it was proper to refuse to rule as a matter of law that the fact of intoxication was not the cause of the accident.—Johnson v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 162 Mich. 301.

¶ 1510. The question of the cause of derailment is one of fact.—Anderson v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 168 Mich. 207.

¶ 1511. The question of whether the width of gauge of a railroad track was the proximate cause of the derailment of certain cars is a question for the jury.—Anderson v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 168 Mich. 207.

¶ 1512. In a suit to recover against a railroad for injuries to plaintiff's decedent, employed as an inspector of freight cars, and who was found injured after defendant's train had pulled out, the question of the manner in which the deceased received his injuries is for the jury where the evidence is conflicting and where there is evidence to sustain a finding making the defendant liable.—Habitz v. Wabash R. Co., 170 Mich. 71. (McAlvay and Brooke, JJ., dissenting.)

¶ 1513. Where plaintiff employed as a brakeman on one of defendant's dump trains used in excavating for canal locks, while riding on the front of the engine is injured when his train collides with the one ahead, there being evidence that the place was not properly lighted, the question whether the condition of the lights was the proximate cause of the injury is properly submitted to the jury.—Murphy v. Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co., 175 Mich. 216.

§ 67d. Jury questions as to negligence of master.

Existence of custom affecting duty of care as jury question, see Customs § 8.

¶ 1514. In an action by a servant against his master for injuries from a kick received by the running away of a horse attached to a delivery wagon which he had been engaged to drive, it appeared that plaintiff was but eighteen years old, and had recently been ill; that the horse was nervous and high-spirited, and "ready to spring and go" if another rig should come up behind; that defendant had driven the horse for some time prior to the accident; that the harness was without a check-rein; that plaintiff had never before driven the animal, and was given no warning. Held, that whether defendant was negligent in intrusting the horse to plaintiff, and in furnishing an insufficient harness, was a question for the jury.—Hoffman v. Adams, 106 Mich. 111.

¶ 1515. Testimony in an action for personal injuries that the plaintiff, an employee in the defendant's shop was in the performance of his duty in oiling a spoke lathe when the foreman threw it into gear causing the sawdust and chips to fly in the plaintiff's face and that he took one step and stumbled and that his arm was cut off in the machine, is sufficient to go to the jury on the question of defendant's negligence unless the foreman was a fellow-servant.—Wellihan v. National Wheel Co., 128 Mich. 1.

¶ 1516. In an action for personal injury causing death, evidence that the mate of the vessel upon which deceased was employed, directed the swinging of a scaffold from which deceased was thrown into the water and drowned, and that it was the duty of the mate to attend to work which he ordered done and to oversee such work himself, raises a question for the jury whether such mate was negligent.—Rick v. Saginaw Bay Towing Co., 132 Mich. 237.

¶ 1517. A train dispatcher ordered a car, without knowledge of any defects in its condition, to follow another car which was in a defective condition. Had the second car been in good condition, and had the train crew of the front car obeyed the rule of the company as to torpedoing the track, the collision would not have occurred. Held, in an action by the conductor of the second car for injury, that it was reversible error to submit to the jury the question of the dispatcher's negligence.—Welch v. Jackson & B. C. Traction Co., 154 Mich. 399.

¶ 1518. Where, in a suit for personal injury caused by the plaintiff being drawn into a pulley shaft, photographs of the situation are placed in evidence, and witnesses testify as to the facts just before, during, and immediately after the accident, it is proper to submit to the jury questions of negligence, contributory negligence, and proximate cause.—Little v. Bousfield & Co., 154 Mich. 369.

¶ 1519. In an action for the death of a servant, offered testimony to the effect that the servant was sent away from his usual employment to a place underneath a chute for loading cars with pigs of iron, that the car standing there was removed, half loaded, without notice to the operator, who continued to let the pigs fall through, one of which struck and killed the servant, was sufficient to make a case for the jury on the question of the defendant's negligence.—Barto v. Detroit Iron & Steel Co., 155 Mich. 94.

¶ 1520. Complainant, employed as a janitress in defendant's building, entered an elevator therein in charge of defendant's regular elevator operator for the purpose of riding to the third floor to her work. She told said operator to stop at the third floor. He did so, opened the gate, and plaintiff, after the elevator had come to a full stop, started to walk out. The elevator suddenly dropped some ten or twelve feet and plaintiff was injured. Said elevator had, prior to the accident, always worked well, and subsequent to the accident it was found to be under perfect control of the lever. Held, the evidence was sufficient without direct proof of the operator's negligence to establish a prima facie case of negligence against defendant.—Mirabile v. Simon J. Murphy Co., 169 Mich. 522.

¶ 1521. Plaintiff's decedent was employed as an inspector of freight cars by defendant railroad. He approached the foreman asking for further instructions. The latter told him that they would eat lunch and then inspect the train standing on the track. Thereupon the deceased took his lantern and a hose and started out in the direction of the oil house for the apparent purpose of eating his lunch. The foreman and other employees shortly afterwards went along one side of the train inspecting same, but saw nothing of the deceased, supposing him to be on the other side. When they reached the end of the train the foreman signaled it to go ahead without finding out where the deceased was, and the latter was injured. Held, the evidence of the foreman's negligence was sufficient to leave to the jury.—Habitz v. Wabash R. Co., 170 Mich. 71.

¶ 1522. In the absence of eyewitnesses, the fact that a brakeman was found in a dying condition beside a track on which he had been switching cars is not sufficient to take to the jury an action against a railway company to recover for his death.—Beach v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 180 Mich. 524.

¶ 1523. Whether the engines of a boat were improperly started before an employee who had just fastened a cable to a dock, had time to escape the tightening cable, when based on conflicting evidence is a question for the jury.—Stetson v. Mackinac Transp. Co., 182 Mich. 355.

¶ 1524. Evidence in an action by a telephone lineman injured by electric shock while stringing new wires on poles, held to present a question for the jury as to the defendant employer's negligence.—Collins v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 193 Mich. 303.

¶ 1525. Where a station agent failed to deliver a message sent by the train dispatcher to the engineer and conductor, informing them of a washout, it is a question of fact for the jury to determine whether the dispatcher owed a duty to find out whether such message was delivered and was negligent for his failure so to do.—Graham v. Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 168 Mich. 41. (Brooke, J., dissenting.)

¶ 1526. In an action by a railroad switchman for damages for personal injuries sustained as the result of being caught between the beam at the front of a switch engine and a post in a fence through which a side track passed into a building as he jumped off the footboard of the engine, held on conflicting evidence, that it was a question for the jury whether the engine was being operated at an excessive speed.—Sergeant v. Grand Rapids & I. Ry. Co., 198 Mich. 385.

¶ 1527. Where a servant was injured by the falling of a scaffold on which he was at work under the direction of a foreman with other employees in installing a heavy piece of metal work, the negligence of the master and lack of contributory negligence of plaintiff were questions for the jury.—Miller v. Mathis Bros., 199 Mich. 406.

¶ 1527a. Although the evidence of defendant's negligence in a personal injury suit may be slight, it is sufficient to carry the case to the jury, whose province it is to determine, under proper instruction, what reasonable inferences, if any, it affords as to defendant's negligence in not inspecting and keeping a hotel elevator operated by plaintiff employee in repair.—Ammer v. Postal, 168 Mich. 405.

§ 67e. Jury questions as to violation of Child Labor Law.

Statutory provisions as to employment of children, see ante § 35.

¶ 1528. The question whether a minor was employed as a hostler about a railway roundhouse in violation of Act No. 285, Pub. Acts 1909, §§ 4009-4063, How. St., 2nd Ed., held properly submitted to the jury.—Boesler v. Copper Range R. Co., 184 Mich. 430.

¶ 1529. Whether a machine at which a minor is placed at work in violation of Act No. 285, Pub. Acts 1909, §§ 4009-4063, How. St., 2nd Ed., is dangerous, is ordinarily a question for the jury.—Great Lakes Laundry Co. v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 184 Mich. 294.

¶ 1530. The question as to whether the employment of a child to run an electric freight elevator is within the prohibition of Pub. Acts 1901, No. 113, § 3, as being dangerous to life and limb of the child must be left to the jury.—Braasch v. Michigan Stove Co., 147 Mich. 676.

¶ 1531. In an action for personal injuries to a boy about 16 years old sustained through working a machine consisting of rollers through which sheets of metal about 40x22 inches were passed, the question as to whether these rollers were a danger to the life and limb was a question of fact for the jury.—Sterling v. Union Carbide Co., 142 Mich. 284.

¶ 1532. Plaintiff's foreman, in attempting to close the door of a still used in the manufacture of soda ash, took hold of the outer edge, swung it back and forth two or three times, and feeling that it was giving way shouted a warning to the men standing near to get out of the way. All of the men assisting in the work except plaintiff escaped injury from the falling door. There was evidence that plaintiff was under sixteen years of age, and that he had been at work only two days. Held, it could not be said as a matter of law that plaintiff's age and inexperience in no way contributed to his injury.—Antosik v. Michigan Alkali Co., 166 Mich. 415.

§ 67f. Jury questions as to sufficiency of appliances, tools, and place to work.

Duty to furnish safe tools, appliances and places, see ante § 46.

Evidence as to sufficiency of tools, appliances and places, see ante §§ 64b, 65d.

¶ 1533. An employee was killed by a knife flying out of a rapidly revolving shaper-head, the first time it was used, and as soon as it reached its highest velocity, before it was applied to cutting lumber. The head was got up on a new plan, and differed from others in use, particularly in the device employed to check the knife's centrifugal tendency. The head was made accurately from the plan but there was some testimony that it violated mechanical science by having nothing but contact pressure to resist centrifugal force. Held, that the fact that the knife did fly out when fastened in as well as it was designed to be had a tendency to prove that the design was bad, and that the case should have gone to the jury on the question whether the implement was reasonably safe and properly designed, and whether the principle involved in it was not a departure from safe methods as before applied.—Marshall v. Widdicomb Furniture Co., 67 Mich. 167.

¶ 1534. In an action for personal injuries the plaintiff is held to have made a sufficient showing of negligence to entitle him to go to the jury, where it appeared that while pulling down an iron door, moved by means of a chain running over pulleys, and fastened to the top of the door, a weight being attached to the other end he was injured by its falling upon him. The chain broke and on inspection it was found to have been connected together at one point with coils or strands of wire, which had broken or pulled apart. Plaintiff was unaware of the existence of this wire connection, and one of his fellow-servants who had been in the defendant's employ for eight years testified to his want of such knowledge and that he had never known of any repairs or inspection of said chain.—Tangney v. Wilson & Co., 87 Mich. 453.

¶ 1535. In an action by an employee for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by reason of an unfit appliance furnished by the employer, it is error to submit to the jury the question whether the particular kind of appliance was commonly used by other employers in the same line of work, where defendant's evidence that it was so used is in no way controverted.—Shadford v. Ann Arbor St. R. Co., 111 Mich. 390.

¶ 1536. The fact that a witness who examined a broken cable after the accident found a "little rust" upon it was insufficient to raise a question for the jury as to its safe condition.—Hennig v. Globe Foundry Co., 112 Mich. 616.

¶ 1537. In a servant's action for injuries due to being thrown from a platform while oiling a shaft, the court should have eliminated from the consideration of the jury all questions of negligence based upon the alleged dangerous proximity of the platform to revolving belts, and upon the alleged insufficient light, no tangible evidence having been presented by plaintiff to sustain either of these theories.—Zimmerman v. Detroit Sulphite Fibre Co., 113 Mich. 1.

¶ 1538. In an action by a servant against a master for personal injuries sustained by falling from a derrick the question of negligence is properly left for the jury where it was the duty of the plaintiff to go to all parts of the derrick supporting himself by holding to the cross pieces and he testifies that a cross piece to which he was holding was rotten and gave way precipitating him to the ground, which testimony is contradicted by defendant by testimony tending to show contributory negligence, but no inspection of the derrick had been made and it was a frail structure erected four years before and exposed to the weather.—Ouellette v. Michigan Alkali Co., 129 Mich. 484.

¶ 1539. It cannot be said as matter of law that an employer who continues in use a belt so loose that it is likely to leave the pulley at any time, running in a position where, on leaving the pulley, it is likely to do injury to an employee, is guilty of no negligence.—Krohn v. Joseph N. Smith & Co., 151 Mich. 247.

¶ 1540. In an action to recover for injuries received while in the performance of his duty as lineman in the employ of defendant, in stringing wires for a telephone, evidence that plaintiff had told the wire chief of the defendant company that he had not proper wire, and that he had asked for more wire to make certain connections, is sufficient to justify the court in submitting to the jury the question of whether it was the duty of the defendant to furnish plaintiff with a sufficient quantity of insulated wire, and whether it had performed such duty.—De Kallands v. Washtenaw Home Tel. Co., 153 Mich. 25.

¶ 1541. Whether a master furnished adequate steam capacity to make the operation of machinery reasonably safe was a question for the jury, where the evidence was subject to different inferences.—Burgess v. Humphrey Bookcase Co., 156 Mich. 345.

¶ 1542. Plaintiff's intestate was killed by the explosion of defendant's soda fountain tank while being instructed how to charge the same by another competent employee. The evidence indicated that the tank was an old and rusty one; that it had worn thin at the bottom and was shattered in that place by the explosion; that it had been painted over by defendant without removing the rust; and that it had been kept in a damp cellar on a wet floor. Held, there was evidence to go to the jury that defendant's negligence in failing to provide a tank in safe condition caused the accident.—McDonnell v. Central Drug Co., 160 Mich. 455.

¶ 1543. Complainant was employed in operating defendant's stamping machine. A spring in the mechanism controlling the press became loose. Plaintiff informed defendant of this and proposed to quit. Defendant told him to continue at work and he would immediately have the spring repaired. Three days before the accident the press came down without the operation of the controlling lever, and there was evidence that this resulted from the fact of the spring being loose. On the occasion in question the press fell in like manner and plaintiff was injured. Held, there was sufficient evidence of defendant's negligence to warrant the submission of the question to the jury.—Prisel v. Coney, 168 Mich. 602.

¶ 1544. There is evidence for the jury as to the defective condition of a machine when it appears from the testimony of the defendant's foreman and other witnesses that the machine was defective and that the defect would tend to cause the accident which caused the injury.—Wiers v. Shaw-Walker Co., 171 Mich. 324.

¶ 1545. Where the question whether an employee was injured as the result of a defect in a freight elevator he was operating depends on conflicting testimony, the question of the employer's negligence is for the jury.—McGary v. Buick Motor Co., 182 Mich. 345.

¶ 1546. Where a scaffolding which had held three men for two hours while they were at work on defendant's house broke when a fourth man, plaintiff, went on it, whether it was safe for four men, held not conjectural and a question for the jury, in an action to recover damages for injuries so sustained.—Bayer v. Grocholski, 196 Mich. 325. (Fellows and Brooke, JJ., dissenting.)

¶ 1547. It is not negligence per se for an employer to keep a barrel of paint containing benzine upon his premises, for use in connection with his business.—Burke v. Parker, Webb & Co., 107 Mich. 88.

¶ 1548. Plaintiff employee was lying on a pile of blocks in discharging his duty of removing them from an elevator shaft, and in that position was near the revolving coupling of a line shaft. Plaintiff testified that he slipped off the pile, and into a projecting bolt in the coupling and was injured. Held, it was a question for the jury whether a safe place to work was provided.—MacDonald v. Freeman Mfg. Co., 160 Mich. 380.

¶ 1549. Plaintiff, a laborer, was employed by defendant in its shipyard. He was directed to carry iron grate bars up ladders and to lay them upon the deck of a vessel. Upon reaching the top of the ladders plaintiff had to step about one foot high over a railing and upon the deck. After making some sixteen trips up one ladder, he was directed by the foreman to use the other ladder. There was evidence that as he reached the top he stepped on the freshly painted deck of the vessel and was injured. Held, it was a question for the jury whether defendant had been negligent in failing to supply a safe place to work.—Orso v. Great Lakes Engineering Works, 164 Mich. 568.

¶ 1550. In an action for alleged wrongful death of a foreman who was testing an automobile on a track constructed for that purpose by defendant when it ran off the track at a banked curve while going 40 miles per hour, the court is not warranted in submitting the question to the jury as to the defendant's negligence in the method of construction where plaintiff's intestate drove faster than defendant's rules allowed, no practical automobile manufacturer gave evidence that the track was not reasonably safe for the purpose of testing cars at various speeds, and it seems that the evidence of civil engineers tends to support the conclusion that it is safe.—Blick v. Olds Motor Works, 175 Mich. 640.

¶ 1551. The negligence of an employer where the premises on which an employee is injured are inadequately lighted is generally a question for the jury.—Wulff v. Bosaler, 199 Mich. 70.

§ 67g. ——Railroad tracks, cars and equipment.

¶ 1552. In an action by a switchman for injuries received while uncoupling cars, it appeared that he was injured by reason of an unblocked frog, and there was evidence that such frog had been unblocked for two months, that other frogs in the same yard were unblocked, and that the yard-master had been notified some time before the accident of their condition. Held, that notice to the yard-master was notice to the company, and that defendant's negligence was a question for the jury.—Ashman v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 90 Mich. 567.

¶ 1553. In an action for the death of an engineer, where the question as to whether the rail which it was claimed caused the derailment in question, was removed from its place, the question was properly withheld from the jury, where a witness for defendant testified that he marked the rail with a chisel on a flange, and that the same rail was still there some days before the trial with his mark on it, and where six other witnesses testified in substance that it had never been changed, some stating that it was a safe rail, while one witness for plaintiff testified that he believed that the worn rail he had seen the day after the accident was not there some days before the trial.—Peppett v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 119 Mich. 640.

¶ 1554. Under Comp. L. 1897, § 6318, requiring railroad companies to protect frogs so as to prevent employees from catching their feet in them, testimony that the blocking was old and worn is sufficient to go to the jury on the question of defendant's negligence in an action for wrongful death of an employee.—Jones v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 127 Mich. 198.

¶ 1555. Where the evidence will support a reasonable and legitimate inference that the death of a brakeman was the result of his foot catching in an unblocked frog, the question of the defendant's negligence is for the jury.—Scott v. Boyne City, G. & A. R. Co., 182 Mich. 514.

¶ 1556. In an action for personal injuries to a brakeman alleged to have been caused by his stepping into a hole between the ties while between two moving cars, testimony by the plaintiff as to the existence of the hole and a pile of dirt and snow controverted by testimony of the defendant is held sufficient to warrant an instruction leaving the question to the jury.—Jarvis v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 128 Mich. 61.

¶ 1557. Where, owing to the formation of ice upon the tracks at a point where the roadbed was slightly depressed a car backing upon a side-track was derailed, killing a brakeman, it was held that it was the company's duty to provide a track which, measured by the standard of good railroading as actually conducted, could be said to be reasonably safe, and that whether it had complied with such duty, or whether it should have foreseen the danger of water's freezing over the tracks, and have adopted sufficient measures to prevent it, was, under all the circumstances, for the jury.—Balhoff v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 106 Mich. 606.

¶ 1558. There was evidence that plaintiff's decedent, a brakeman in defendant's employ, was injured as a consequence of stepping into a hole in an obscure place on the track scales of defendant, while employed in his usual duties, and that such hole had existed for a considerable space of time. Held, there was evidence to go to the jury of defendant's negligence in failing to provide a reasonably safe place for the brakeman to work.—Gilbert v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 161 Mich. 73.

¶ 1559. Evidence held sufficient to justify the submission of the negligence of a railroad company in permitting a gauge of less than four feet eight and one-half inches upon a curve, to the jury.—Anderson v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 168 Mich. 207

¶ 1560. Where, an engineer, who for purposes of inspection is a vice principal before starting upon a trip, discovers that the push-bar upon the front of his engine is cracked, but, thinking that it will answer for the trip, which would otherwise be delayed, he does not report the defect, and, in attempting to make a coupling, the pushbar is broken and the brakeman injured, the question whether it was negligence to use the engine in its defective condition is for the jury.—McDonald v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 108 Mich. 7.

¶ 1561. There was evidence that the complainant brakeman tried to use the lever to uncouple two cars, and was unable to pull the pin; that he signaled the engine for "slack," and still could not do it; and that after being injured by going between the cars he again tried without success to operate the lever. No evidence of when the device was last used was offered. Held, it could not be said as a matter of law that there was no evidence of the defective condition of the coupling device.—Wight v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 161 Mich. 216.

¶ 1562. Where it does not appear that there was any standard width for coal cars but that the width thereof varied, the question whether a car between the side of which and a coal tipple an employee of the company was caught and injured, was of unusual width should not have been submitted to the jury.—Lewis v. Wolverine Coal Co., 186 Mich. 564.

¶ 1563. Plaintiff's decedent was employed by the Pere Marquette Railroad as a yardmaster. Defendant railroad used the Pere Marquette tracks. There was evidence that defendant was accustomed to employ a lookout and lights on its engines, and that on the occasion in question its engine had none. It ran into plaintiff's decedent while he was in discharge of his duties, and killed him. Held, the case was properly submitted to the jury on the question of law and fact.—Jackson v. Detroit & M. Ry. Co., 161 Mich. 163.

¶ 1564. The question of the negligence of the defendant in an action for injuries sustained by a brakeman slipping and falling in front of a switch engine which had a defective brake so that it could not be stopped in time to avoid the accident, held properly submitted to the jury.—Nelson v. Michigan Tanning & Extract Co., 184 Mich. 108.

¶ 1565. The question of an employer's negligence in providing an employee with a defective electric hand lamp, was properly submitted to the jury, where the employee, on the lamp failing to work, took it for repairs to an electrical repair shop maintained by the defendant in connection with his business, and, a few minutes after returning with the lamp in working order, was killed while using it.—Breen v. Grand Rapids & I. Ry. Co., 184 Mich. 446.

¶ 1566. The question whether a vise is a proper and reasonably safe tool for drawing up trolley wires upon a curve, and whether such tool is in common use, is for the jury where the evidence is contradictory.—Shadford v. Ann Arbor St. Ry. Co., 121 Mich. 224.

¶ 1567. The defendant traction company was accustomed to inspect its cars every evening. Plaintiff, a conductor, was injured by a collision of his car with a car ahead. The motorman of plaintiff's car testified that the car acted "funny," and the brakes seemed not to be working just right. Held, there was evidence to go to the jury of defendant's negligence in failing to keep the car in reasonably safe condition.—Welch v. Jackson & B. C. Traction Co., 154 Mich. 399.

¶ 1568. Whether a defendant railway's failure to supply its car with a brake as required by statute contributed to causing a collision at a crossing by which the motorman was killed, and whether said motorman acted without negligence, are questions for the jury, and the court cannot decide them in favor of defendant as a matter of law on the theory that the plaintiff might have stopped his car before reaching the crossing.—Rivers v. Bay City Traction & Electric Co., 164 Mich. 696.

¶ 1569. In an action by a conductor of a motor car, who was injured by the absence of a step on the side of the car used in ascending and descending from the top, when he went to repair a rope attached to the trolley, it cannot be said that there was no evidence for the jury of defendant's negligence where it is reasonable to infer from evidence that the car was in the same condition at the time of the injury as when inspected at the barn.—Leary v. Houghton County Traction Co., 171 Mich. 365.

§ 67h. ——Operation of mines.

¶ 1570. An employee in defendant's mine was injured by the falling of some staging upon which he was at work, but with the construction or repair of which he had nothing to do; and the evidence tended to show that the fall was caused by the displacement of a timber brace by blasting a large quantity of ore down upon the top of the staging from twenty-four to thirty-six hours before the accident. No inspection of the staging was made by defendant, whose negligence, it was held, was for the jury.—Eddy v. Aurora Iron Mining Co., 81 Mich. 548.

¶ 1571. A plank in a platform constructed in a mining shaft was disturbed by blasting at a lower level, and plaintiff, an employee in the mine, while attempting to cross such platform, fell and was injured. Upon the question of fact whether the planks were spiked down, the workman who supervised the construction of the platform, and a shift boss who was with plaintiff at the time of the injury, testified in the affirmative. The latter further testified that, upon replacing some of the planks after the explosion, the spikes fitted the same holes they had been drawn out of; that the planks "went down even" at the first effort, with no more force applied than simply stepping upon them. A fellow workman testified that he saw no spikes in the plank, and other witnesses testified that blasts such as the one used would not be likely to disturb a platform if spiked down. Held, that, upon the whole evidence, the question was for the jury.—Smizel v. Odanah Iron Co., 116 Mich. 149.

¶ 1572. There was evidence that defendant mining company failed to provide in an elevator cage as handholds the iron bars and rings required by section 151, Act No. 100, Pub. Acts 1905. In a suit for the death of plaintiff's intestate, occurring while ascending in the cage, held, it was a question for the jury whether there was neglect to comply with the statute.—Kleinfelt v. J. H. Somers Coal Co., 156 Mich. 473.

¶ 1573. Where a plaintiff miner is injured by a rock falling from the roof of the drift, it is for the jury to decide whether it was defendant's duty to remove such rock, whether the failure so to remove it was the negligence of defendant, and whether plaintiff was negligent.—Lewis v. Detroit Vitrified Brick Co., 164 Mich. 489.

¶ 1574. Plaintiff and other miners were engaged in mining shale rock in a drift leading off from the main shaft of the mine. Cars were loaded with the shale by them and pushed out to the main gallery to be hoisted. Defendant's boss, Peake, went down into the mine and did the dynamiting in the drift whenever it was necessary. Above the drift in question there was a drift from which coal had at one time been mined, and as the work progressed the roof of said drift constituted the roof of the shale drift in question. The coal drift had at one time been timbered and the timbers were removed by defendant and no new ones put in. A rock fell from the roof of the drift and injured plaintiff. Held, the question whether defendant owed a duty to furnish plaintiff a safe place to work under these conditions was for the jury.—Lewis v. Detroit Vitrified Brick Co., 164 Mich. 489.

¶ 1575. On evidence showing that the engine used by a mining company to hoist its men to an upper level when holes were blasted in the sinking shaft was antiquated and in bad repair the question of defendant's negligence in furnishing such machinery should have been submitted to the jury.—Panela v. Castile Min. Co., 177 Mich. 669.

¶ 1576. In an action for wrongful death caused when a loose trolley wire in a mine struck deceased, a trammer, the question of the mining company's negligence is for the jury where it appears that the wire was loose twenty-four hours before the accident and was tied up with a piece of fuse as directed by the trammer-boss, that it was loose just before the accident and was placed on top of the end of the defective clamp with which it was fastened and that it was later pushed off and struck deceased.—Meola v. Quincy Min. Co., 174 Mich. 305.

¶ 1577. Evidence that an employer placed electric wires in a narrow passage in a mine through which miners were obliged to pass, and recognized the danger by adopting a system for covering the wires, and that an employee was injured from contact with an exposed wire, is sufficient to take the question of the employer's negligence to the jury.—Hazzard v. Consolidated Coal Co., 183 Mich. 363.

§ 67i. ——Master's knowledge or notice of defects or dangers.

¶ 1578. In a suit by a trammer for injury from rock falling from an overhanging wall, the question as to whether plaintiff called the attention of the captain and boss to the loose overhanging rock is properly submitted to the jury where the evidence is conflicting.—Scendar v. Winona Copper Co., 169 Mich. 665.

¶ 1579. Whether an employer should have anticipated injury to passing employees from flying chips from iron being chipped with a cold chisel, held a question for the jury.—Webb v. Buick Motor Co., 182 Mich. 551.

¶ 1580. Plaintiff was employed to run a heading machine in defendant's barrel factory. There was evidence that the loose pulley upon which the belt connected with the main shaft was shifted in order to stop plaintiff's machine, got out of order; that plaintiff was thereafter accustomed to throw off the belt and loop it up to keep the main shaft from burning it, whenever he wanted to stop his machine; that, while standing on a barrel in the act of looping up the belt, plaintiff was involved in the shafting and injured; and that for some time previous the loose ends of a temporary rope pulley had been hanging from the shaft, in which plaintiff alleges he was caught and drawn into the shaft; and that defendant knew of the method of looping up the belt, and of the rope pulley. Held, there was a question for the jury whether the defendant might not reasonably apprehend that the ends of the rope pulley would unwind and hang down.—Trombley v. McAfee, 152 Mich. 494.

§ 67j. Jury questions as to methods, rules, and orders.

¶ 1581. It is not negligence per se for a railroad company to shunt cars along the tracks in its yard pursuant to a long-standing custom fully known to its employees.—Schaible v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 97 Mich. 318.

¶ 1582. Whether swinging a plank for staging on the side of a vessel by means of a single rope with a loop at each end, into which the end of the plank was inserted, was negligence is for the jury under evidence that if two lines had been employed, as was customary, or if a single line had been properly attached, the accident could not have happened.—Rick v. Saginaw Bay Towing Co., 132 Mich. 287.

¶ 1583. The testimony of two witnesses that in their opinion it would be safer to have an extra man stand by a wringer ready to stop it in case of accident while the operator was winding burlap about the rollers, is not sufficient to raise the issue for jury as to whether the work could be properly and safely done by one person exercising care of a reasonably cautious and prudent man.—Fryczynski v. W. W. Rice Leather Co., 171 Mich. 113.

¶ 1584. Whether a telephone lineman's method of drawing two wires across a trolley wire at once, was more unsafe than to draw them across one at a time, held, upon the record in an action for injuries by him against the telephone company, his employer, a question of fact for the jury.—De Kallands v. Washtenaw Home Tel. Co., 158 Mich. 25.

¶ 1585. In an action against a railway company for injuries, where compliance with rules of the company is in question, it is the duty of the trial court to construe and apply the rules.—Fernette v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 175 Mich. 653.

¶ 1586. In an action against a railroad company by a locomotive engineer for injuries sustained in a collision, it was error to submit to the jury the question whether defendant's rules for the control and management of its trains were reasonably sufficient for the protection of employees, where there was no evidence of carelessness in the formulation of the rules, or of prior accident attending their operation, or of more effective regulations adopted by other roads.—Whalen v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 114 Mich. 512.

¶ 1587. In an action for injuries sustained by a motorman on a suburban street car in a collision with another car which was backing up, plaintiff's claim that it should have been left for the jury to say whether the accident was not due to the want of reasonable and necessary rules for the backing of cars was denied, where there was no showing that any rule different from that adopted by the defendant, was in use on any street railway in the country.—Seccombe v. Detroit Elec. Ry., 133 Mich. 170.

¶ 1588. Plaintiff, a section hand, was employed by defendant railroad in clearing up a wreck, and was injured while riding into town to dinner on one of defendant's engines. Plaintiff offered in evidence the rule books of other railroad companies to prove that a certain rule of defendant's was not as well adapted to protect the employees as the corresponding rule of said other companies. Had the employees in charge of the engine obeyed the defendant's rule, the accident would not have happened. Held, the court properly refused to submit to the jury the question on this evidence whether defendant's rule was sufficient.—Moyer v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 159 Mich. 645.

¶ 1589. Where it seems that it was snowing and was somewhat dark when a special train struck the rear of another train at a station it is a question of fact for the jury whether it was the duty of a brakeman of the train at the station to protect his train under a rule requiring such protection when "fog, snow, darkness, dangerous places or other circumstances render it necessary."—Fernette v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 175 Mich. 653.

¶ 1590. It cannot be said as a matter of law that a brakeman injured by the moving of cars is required for his protection to place a light at the rear of the train made up except for the testing of the air, before attempting to cut the air from the engine in order to repair a leaky hose, though a rule of the railroad company provides that those working about cars or engines in such a manner that personal injuries might result if the car or engine is moved must protect themselves by such a light.—Sonsmith v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 173 Mich. 57.

¶ 1591. It is for the jury to say whether plaintiff was directed to clean off revolving rolls on the dangerous side, where having cleaned them on the safe side he was directed by his foreman to clean them better, pointing to them from the dangerous side, and the foreman came and stood by him while he cleaned them again, this time on the wrong side.—Kean v. Detroit Copper & Brass Rolling Mills, 66 Mich. 277.

¶ 1592. The extent to which a foreman was affected by habits of intoxication, and whether he was so affected when he gave directions to an employee to do a dangerous act is a question for the jury in an action by the employee for injuries sustained in obeying such directions.—Kean v. Detroit Copper & Brass Rolling Mills, 66 Mich. 277.

§ 67k. Jury questions as to tests and inspections.

¶ 1593. Whether a master made the necessary inspection of the place where a servant was required to work is a question for the jury, where the evidence relating thereto is conflicting.—Kochin v. Superior Copper Co., 181 Mich. 542.

¶ 1594. Plaintiff, a locomotive engineer in defendant's employ, was injured by the explosion of the boiler of the engine, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence in not properly inspecting the boiler, and in permitting its use when a large number of its stay-bolts were broken. The last hammer test was made by two of defendant's inspectors not more than fourteen days before the explosion. One of the inspectors testified that, if the bolts were broken off, but the ends were tight together, there might be very little difference in the sound of the hammer and the jar from what there would be if they were solid,—not enough to convince him that they were broken; that, if there were four bolts broken in a row, their discovery might depend upon whether or not the sheet was sprung. There was testimony tending to show that at least ninety per cent of the broken bolts could have been discovered by the hammer inspection; that a large number of bolts had been broken for so long a time before the injury that their ends had become smooth; that the process of wearing them smooth must necessarily have been very slow; and that these bolts break gradually. Held, a jury question whether a proper hammer test had been made.—Woods v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 108 Mich. 396.

¶ 1595. Where a railroad company when sued for injuries from the defective condition of the handle-bar on a hand-car introduced testimony that it employed an inspector whose duty it was to examine the car every morning and report, and that the section foreman was also required to make an examination and report, and where plaintiff's testimony tended to show that the inspector instead of examining the car relied upon the foreman's testimony that it was all right, held, that a question of fact was raised for the jury.—Greenfield v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 117 Mich. 307.

¶ 1596. The rule that negligence cannot be inferred from mere proof of an accident and consequent injury does not apply where a pressman is injured while operating a press used to form stove tops, due to the falling of the upper die, where the evidence shows that the press had been making trouble continually, due to the cutting of a clutch pin, which caused the press to drop. The question of whether the clutch pin was gradually cutting, and whether proper inspection would have prevented the injury was for the jury in such case.—Burnside v. Novelty Mfg. Co., 121 Mich. 115.

¶ 1597. A 35-foot ladder attached to a water tank, only occasionally used, cannot be held, as a matter of law, to be a common tool or appliance within the meaning of the rules which exempt the master from the duty to inspect them upon the presumption that those using them will, and should, first discover defects.—Nichols v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 145 Mich. 643.

¶ 1598. An eye-bolt of defendant's hoisting apparatus broke, and the plaintiff's intestate, an employee of the defendant, was injured by the falling of a coal bucket. There was testimony from several witnesses that the bolt was defective, and that the defects might have been discovered by an ordinary inspection. Held, that the question whether the defect might have been so discovered was one for the jury.—Nelson v. Pittsburg Coal Dock Co., 158 Mich. 306.

¶ 1599. Plaintiff was injured while employed in turning car axles at a lathe by the giving way of a crane used to lift the axles upon the lathe. There was evidence that the arm of the crane had been lengthened without strengthening its base; that excessive loads were lifted; and that an inspection would have revealed that the base had become brittle and infirm. Held, the evidence of defendant's negligence was sufficient to go to the jury.—Niblock v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 158 Mich. 582.

¶ 1600. Plaintiff was injured by the breaking of a jar of nitric acid while attempting to move another jar near it. There was evidence that the jar broke from a latent defect and not from the application of any force from the outside; and that defendant made only a visual inspection, whereas the only effective test was to strike it with something. Held, the evidence warranted the submission of the question of defendant's negligence to the jury.—Krettnich v. Detroit Chemical Works, 163 Mich. 462.

¶ 1601. In a suit for injuries caused to plaintiff by the falling of the door of a still while plaintiff and others were attempting to close the same, there was evidence that the bolt in the upper hinge of the door broke while an attempt was being made to close it; that the door weighed from seven hundred to eight hundred pounds; that the bolt had rusted in the hinge so that it was necessary to drill the upper half out; that the lower half was tight and driven out with a hammer; and that there had been no inspection for a long time. Held, there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury as to whether defendant owed a duty to inspect the door, and as to whether it had been negligent in the matter of such inspection.—Antosik v. Michigan Alkali Co., 166 Mich. 415.

¶ 1602. In a suit by a trammer for injury from rock falling from an overhanging wall, the question as to whether defendant properly inspected and tested the wall is for the jury where a witness testifies that the inspection and tests made fell far short of what was usually done at defendant's mine.—Scendar v. Winona Copper Co., 169 Mich. 665.

¶ 1603. Evidence that an employer was informed of and failed to remedy a defect in a boiler, and that an insufficient inspection was made, is sufficient to take to the jury the question of his negligence in an action to recover for the death of an employee as the result of the explosion of the boiler.—Sturgis v. Mt. Clemens Sugar Co., 184 Mich. 456.

§ 671. Jury questions as to warnings and instructions.

Necessity of warnings and instructions, see ante § 54.

Evidence as to warnings and instructions, see ante §§ 64f, 65i.

Instructions as to warnings and instructions, see post § 71d.

¶ 1604. Although a section man who was in the habit of handling rails could hardly need information as to the way they should be handled, even in loading a moving car with them, it could not be said as a matter of law that the railroad company did not owe him the duty of warning him against danger of rails falling off after being thrown upon the moving car in question.—LaBarre v. Grand Trunk W. Ry. Co., 133 Mich. 192.

¶ 1605. The question of negligence of an employer in failing to instruct its servant on the dangers of his work was for the jury, in an action for personal injuries from the premature explosion of dynamite in a stone quarry; where it appeared that such servant, working according to his instructions, first placed the fuse in a hole drilled in the rock, and then tried to insert the stick of dynamite; that it was frozen, and the hole being a little too small, he pressed down the stick of dynamite with his thumb, and the friction resulted in such explosion; and where expert testimony was given to the effect that such a method of loading the hole was extremely dangerous, that the dynamite was liable to be exploded by the friction against the fuse, that frozen dynamite was more liable to such friction.—Kopp v. Monroe Stone Co., 140 Mich. 649.

¶ 1606. Where there is a conflict of evidence as to whether or not plaintiff was instructed as to the operation of a brake upon a stamping press, or as to its liability to become loose, and the necessity for tightening it, or as to the promptness with which he should remove his foot from the treadle, or as to the reports that the machine had repeated, and as to the necessity for not removing work with his fingers, such question should be submitted to the jury.—Clemens v. Gem Fibre Package Co., 153 Mich. 495.

¶ 1607. Evidence was given that a train dispatcher authorized a conductor of one train to leave a part of a broken train on a main track at Cushman while he went back on a branch track to get the rest of the train. The broken train was so left at night, and without lights. The dispatcher then ordered the plaintiff, an engineer, to run his train down the main track with no other warning than to look out for trains switching at Cushman. Plaintiff ran into the broken train and was injured. Held, there was evidence to go to the jury of the defendant company's negligence.—Dugan v. Boyne City, G. & A. R. Co., 158 Mich. 450.

¶ 1608. Plaintiff employee was lying on a pile of blocks discharging his duty in removing them from an elevator shaft, and in that position was near the revolving coupling of a line shaft. Plaintiff testified that he slipped off the pile, and into a projecting bolt in the coupling, and was injured. Held, that whether it was the duty of defendant employer to warn plaintiff of the presence of the bolt, was for the jury.—MacDonald v. Freeman Mfg. Co., 160 Mich. 380.

¶ 1609. Plaintiff was employed by defendant to draw off the molten product from the melting pot in the process of manufacturing porcelain. A tank was used to receive the molten mass, and it was necessary to fill it with the proper amount of water before receiving the mass. Plaintiff filled the tank about one-third full of water and upon the contact of the molten mass with the water an explosion occurred injuring plaintiff. An expert witness testified that such explosions occurred at times from an insufficient supply of water whereby the water was suddenly converted into steam. Held, it was a question for the jury in this case whether there was a natural law involved about which defendant owed a duty to inform the plaintiff.—Adams v. Grand Rapids Refrigerator Co., 160 Mich. 590.

¶ 1610. Plaintiff prior to his injury had been employed in and about defendant's caustic soda plant, had helped to take out and put in the kettles used for boiling, and had shoveled the finished product. He was injured while cleaning a kettle pit by a piece of the soda flying up and burning his eye. Held, it was a question of fact for the jury whether defendant owed a duty to warn plaintiff of the injurious nature of the soda.—Dascho v. Michigan Alkali Co., 163 Mich. 612.

¶ 1611. Submission to the jury of the question whether a locomotive was moved without warning to a hostler who was cleaning the ashpan, or whether moved in obedience to his order, held not prejudicial to the defendant in an action under Act No. 104, Pub. Acts 1909, §§ 4110-4116, How. St., 2nd Ed.—Boesler v. Copper Range R. Co., 184 Mich. 430.

§ 67m. ——Immature or inexperienced employees.

¶ 1612. Negligence in loading rails on moving flat cars was for the jury; where the rails lay along the track for three miles, were 30 feet long and of the weight of 650 pounds, and were loaded on the car while the same was moving at the rate of four miles an hour, necessitating the plaintiff and those with him on the work to run in order to keep up, meanwhile lifting and loading; and when one of the rails, so loaded on the car, fell off and broke the leg of the plaintiff, who was a green hand and had not been warned of the danger of the employment.—

Palmer v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 87 Mich. 281.

¶ 1613. Question whether reasonable care required that plaintiff, 15 years of age, injured by getting his hand cut off in a feed cutter which he was operating for the first time on the day of the injury, should have been instructed as to the manner of operating the machine safely, is for the jury, though he knew of and appreciated the danger of putting his hands in the machine where they might come into contact with the knives.—Ertz v. Pierson, 130 Mich. 160.

¶ 1614. In an action against the owner of a paper mill for injuries resulting to an inexperienced employee fourteen years of age from having her hand caught between the rollers of a machine about which she was employed, it was a question for the jury whether the owner, in view of the plaintiff's youth and inexperience, was in duty bound to instruct her how to do her work, or was justified in leaving her to learn the proper method from observation and experience, inasmuch as it was obvious that her hand would be injured if it should get between the rollers.—Allen v. Jakel, 115 Mich. 484.

¶ 1615. In an action by an employee for personal injuries caused by a wabble saw the cause is properly submitted to the jury where the declaration alleges that pieces of the timber would become wedged between the saws, thereby throwing it from under the hand of the operator and his hand upon the saw, that the defendant had notice and failed to warn the plaintiff, and the testimony shows that the saws were defective and dangerous, that the plaintiff had no experience and knew nothing of the danger and was not warned by the defendant.—Chilson v. Lansing Wagon Works, 128 Mich. 43.

¶ 1616. In an action for wrongful death of one employed as a laborer and oiler in the basement of a sawmill caused by his clothing catching on a set-screw on a shaft, evidence that the basement was poorly lighted, that the set-screw projected about two inches, that it was unprotected, that it was located in a place where the deceased would climb over it to oil other machinery, that he was inexperienced in that branch of the work, and that he had never been instructed or warned as to the set-screw, is sufficient to go to the jury on the question of the defendant's negligence.—Barr v. Guelph Patent Cask Co., 129 Mich. 278.

¶ 1617. In an action for personal injuries to a boy 14 years old who had been injured while in defendant's employ in removing table tops from a sanding machine, through his endeavor to straighten some material going through the sander, with the result that his hands were caught between the rolls, the question whether the employer was negligent in having omitted to instruct and warn him as to the proper method of doing the work was one for the jury.—Kolodziejski v. Seestadt, 143 Mich. 38.

¶ 1618. In an action for personal injuries to a boy 14 years old set at work and told how to run an elevator, the question as to whether he should have other and further instructions as to the danger incident to his employment, and should have been warned of the dangers is a question for the jury.—Braasch v. Michigan Stove Co., 147 Mich. 676.

¶ 1619. Where plaintiff, who was employed in unloading cars at defendant's factory, at the direction of the foreman went between certain cars for the purpose of coupling them, and while there was injured through another car being bumped into the cars upon which he was working, it is a question for the jury as to whether defendant was guilty of actionable wrong in failing to provide for some warning of the danger of the approaching car to be given to one occupying the position which plaintiff occupied, where the evidence showed that plaintiff was unfamiliar with the methods of defendant, and had not thought that an absence of any regulation of the subject would result in such reckless conduct as to push a car against the dead car at which he was lawfully stationed.—Pecard v. Menominee River Sugar Co., 153 Mich. 84.

¶ 1620. In an action for damages against a shingle manufacturing company for personal injuries received by a green employee while attempting to remove a sliver from a revolving saw, within the line of his employment, it is a question for the jury whether the plaintiff was sufficiently instructed and warned before being set at such an employment.—Martin v. Jerry Madden Shingle Co., 168 Mich. 176.

¶ 1621. Where there was a sharp dispute among the witnesses as to whether the plaintiff, who was eighteen years of age and who had no experience with a buzz planer, represented himself as twenty-one years old and as having had experience, and also as to his skill in operating the machine as an indication of his experience, the evidence did not so preponderate in favor of the defendant that the question should not have been submitted to the jury to find whether the defendant gave the plaintiff notice that the machine was dangerous, and to find the facts concerning plaintiff's representations to the defendant, and also whether from his lack of skill a prudent man would have known of his lack of experience.—Wiers v. Shaw-Walker Co., 171 Mich. 324.

¶ 1622. Plaintiff, a seventeen-year-old boy, was employed in defendant's factory as an operator on a punch machine. Owing to his having placed a truck too close to the machine the treadle operating the machine became caught in the truck and plaintiff's hand was caught in the machine after he had supposedly stopped it by releasing the treadle. Held that similar accidents had happened in the factory and it was defendant's duty to notify plaintiff of the danger, and whether he did so or not was a question for the jury under the evidence.—Berky v. American Seating Co., 178 Mich. 586.

¶ 1623. Whether a boy under eighteen years of age was properly instructed before being placed at work at a dangerous machine in violation of section 11 of Act No. 285, Pub. Acts 1909 (How. St., 2nd Ed., § 4019), are properly submitted to the jury, when resting on conflicting testimony.—Powell v. E. H. Stafford Mfg. Co., 183 Mich. 1.

¶ 1624. In an action for the death of a hoisting machine operator who had been ordered to help in the construction of a platform around a flue 85 feet high, where it appeared that deceased was inexperienced in such work, and was not warned about the danger or character of the work, held that the negligence of the defendant was a question for the jury.—Lobenstein v. Whitehead & Kales Iron Works, 192 Mich. 118.

§ 67n. Jury questions as to guards and signals.

¶ 1625. Where in an action for a negligent injury the evidence conclusively shows that it was not usual or feasible to put a cover or screen over the machine in the use of which plaintiff's hand was mutilated by coming in contact with the knives which formed a part of the machine, it is error to submit to the jury the question whether defendant was negligent in not covering up or protecting the machine by some screen, device, or apparatus that would have prevented the injury complained of.—Mackin v. Alaska Refrigerator Co., 100 Mich. 276.

¶ 1626. A servant was put to work operating rattlers in a foundry where no attempt to guard machinery as required by Public Acts 1909, Act 285, § 15, How. 2nd Ed., § 4023, was made. To start the machinery it was necessary to climb upon a barrel several times a day and put a heavy and defective belt by hand on a pulley eight feet above the floor. Held, the negligence of the master in failing to provide proper appliances and a safe place to work was a question of fact for the jury.—Glassbrook v. Lansing Wheelbarrow Co., 177 Mich. 29.

¶ 1627. It cannot be said to be negligence as matter of law for a master owning a vessel tied up for the winter and employing a crew thereon, who ate, lived and slept on board, to fail to have watchmen on duty to guard them while sleeping against danger by fire, where the only fire was in a small boiler used to heat the cabins and in kerosene lamps used to light it.—Lang v. H. W. Williams Transp. Line, 119 Mich. 80.

¶ 1628. A semaphore had been placed by men of experience in railroading, and was visible for more than half a mile. Its warning would have been reasonably effective to prevent the accident had it not been for the unexpected failure of the air brakes. Plaintiff testified that, if it had been located about a mile farther east, he could have stopped his train without the brakes in time to avoid the collision. Held, that it was error to submit to the jury, upon this evidence, the question of defendant's negligence in locating the signal; it not being bound to guard against the possibility of unusual accident.—Whalen v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 114 Mich. 512.

¶ 1629. Where an employer is conveying plaintiff, an employee, to a certain point by boat but is required by circumstances to put him ashore in the dark on its own premises at another place which is strange to him, and the captain of the employer's boat directs him to its boarding house, the employer owes plaintiff the duty to direct him by a reasonably safe way if any exists, and if the way is unsafe or may become so during plaintiff's journey over it, to advise him of it or to escort him, and whether an escort with a lantern is sufficient under the circumstances is for the jury.—McFarland v. Charles Hebard & Son, 174 Mich. 347.

¶ 1630. Whether defendant company discharged its duty to plaintiff, an employee, is for the jury, where it seems that he, with other employees, was landed on its premises which were strange to him from one of its boats when it was dark and was directed by the captain to go by way of a tramway to the company's boarding house, that there was a merchandise dock on which plaintiff might have been landed, that to get upon the tramway it was necessary to climb a pile of timber, that a tram car drawn by a horse was heard approaching, that no light was carried by plaintiffs' party or upon the car and that plaintiff who was afraid of the car which he could not see stepped to the side of the tramway and fell off and was injured.—McFarland v. Charles Hebard & Son, 174 Mich. 347.

¶ 1631. Plaintiff was employed as a timber man in the fifteenth level of defendant's mine. While pushing a car along a track running over the mouth of a chute of which plaintiff had no knowledge, he fell into the same, and was injured. There was contradictory evidence as to whether an electric light was burning over the chute at the time. Held, the question was a material one in determining defendant's liability for the injury, and was one for the jury.—Kaukola v. Oliver Iron Mining Co., 159 Mich. 689.

¶ 1632. Plaintiff was injured by falling into a chute or raise while employed in the mine. Two of defendant's witnesses testified that a light was customarily kept burning at the raise for the protection of workmen. Held, that this evidence established a question for the jury as to whether the lights were placed for the benefit and safety of employees.—Kaukola v. Oliver Iron Mining Co., 159 Mich. 689.

¶ 1633. An elevator in a mining shaft was operated by an engine stationed on the second story of the shaft house. Signals were given to the engineer by means of a wire extending down the shaft to the bottom of the mine, at which place a signal man was stationed. The orders were that no one except the signal man should give the signals to the engineer, but on the first story of the shaft house there was a landing at which a signal might be given by other persons. Plaintiff was being drawn up with other laborers on the elevator. On arriving at the first story landing several of the laborers lifted the automatic gates of the elevator and stepped out. Plaintiff lifted the gate to get out and while in this position the elevator started up and he was injured. It did not appear whether the engineer started from a signal given from the bottom of the mine, or from said first story landing. Held, it was a question for the jury whether defendant was negligent for failure to provide a proper signal system.—Delbusso v. American Cement Plaster Co., 165 Mich. 318.

¶ 1634. Where plaintiff was injured while blasting in a mine because of delay in hoisting the bucket containing the miners after lighting the fuses, held, on evidence showing that the electrical signaling apparatus was defective and not properly inspected, the question of defendant's negligence should have been submitted to the jury.—Panela v. Castile Min. Co., 177 Mich. 669.

§ 67o. Jury questions as to negligence of or care by fellow-servants.

Liability for acts of fellow-servant, see ante § 55.

Instructions as to acts of fellow-servant and duty to employ competent servants, see post § 71e.

¶ 1635. It was not error to allow the jury to pass on the question whether a lineman was injured through the negligence of fellow-servants in imposing an undue strain by drawing wires over a decayed pole apparently sound, where there was evidence warranting the finding that he might rightfully have assumed that it was sound when erected and therefore strong enough to withstand the strain imposed at the time he was injured.—Livingway v. Houghton County St. Ry. Co., 145 Mich. 86.

¶ 1635a. Defendant, a contractor, built a concrete cellar wall. Defendant's brother, who was in charge of the work, ordered plaintiff, employed as a mixer, to help remove the curbing from the wall. The wall fell and injured plaintiff. Held, it could not be held as a matter of law that the brother in giving the order was the fellow-servant of the plaintiff.—Gerstler v. Weinberg, 160 Mich. 267.

¶ 1636. Plaintiff and other miners were engaged in mining shale rock in a drift leading from the main shaft of the mine. Cars were loaded with the shale by them and pushed out to the main gallery to be hoisted. Defendant's boss, one Peake, went down into the mine and did the dynamiting in the drift whenever it was necessary. Above the drift in question there was a drift from which coal had at one time been mined, and as the work progressed the roof of said drift constituted the roof of the shale drift in question. The coal drift had at one time been timbered and the timbers were removed by defendant and no new ones put in. A rock fell from the roof of the drift and injured plaintiff. Peake had knowledge of the condition of the roof and the danger of falling rocks. Held, the question whether Peake and plaintiff were fellow-servants was for the jury.—Lewis v. Detroit Vitrified Brick Co., 164 Mich. 489.

§ 67p. ——Care in hiring or retaining servant.

¶ 1637. Where a defendant company has exercised due care and prudence in choosing its servants no presumption of unfitness afterwards arises; but the master cannot shut his eyes to what may afterwards take place. So, where repeated instances of carelessness or incompetency are shown on the part of the servant, it remains for the jury to determine whether they did come to the knowledge of the master, or would have, had ordinary care been exercised on his part.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 46 Mich. 176.

¶ 1638. Whether an employer exercised due care to ascertain the qualifications of a servant at the time of hiring him is for the court to determine, whether the testimony as to what took place at such time is undisputed.—Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines, 115 Mich. 629.

¶ 1639. In an action for the wrongful death of an engineer resulting from the alleged incompetence of the yardmaster, where there was evidence that the latter was intemperate, and the attention of the company had been called to such fact, it was the company's duty to make careful and frequent investigation upon the subject. In the present case, held that there was sufficient evidence given to put the company on guard, and it was a matter for the jury to pass upon.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 46 Mich. 176.

¶ 1640. What is reasonable care in the selection by an employer of competent men for positions of responsibility and what is reasonable diligence on the part of such employer in seeing that such employees remain trustworthy in the discharge of their duties, is a question of fact for the jury.—Hilts v. Chicago & Grand Trunk Ry., 55 Mich. 437.

¶ 1641. In an action for personal injuries by a brakeman who had been injured while coupling cars and who had had no other experience in switching than that he had been a helper in the freight yard for one month the question of the incompetency of the yardmaster employed by the railroad sued for the alleged negligent injury is for the jury to determine where it appeared that he did not know the yardmaster except to have seen him at work in the office, and that plaintiff was injured in making up a freight train at the east end of the train and he had no notice from any source that a crew was working at the west end or that the main train would be moved, and several witnesses had testified that the yardmaster was incompetent, but the plaintiff himself knew nothing about his experience or knowledge.—Lee v. Mich. Cent. Railroad Company, 87 Mich. 574.

¶ 1642. In an action for injuries sustained by a motorman in a collision of his car with another car which was backing up, the fellow-servant rule applied as to the negligence of the conductor of the latter car in being absent from the rear platform of his car and his consequent failure to stop the car earlier; and the testimony on that question made the competency of the conductor a proper one for consideration, if his incompetency and the defendant's negligence in relation thereto were proved, to relieve plaintiff from the effect of such rule.—Seccombe v. Detroit Elec. Ry., 133 Mich. 170.

¶ 1643. Plaintiff, a station agent of defendant railway, was injured by a conductor in defendant's employ, while they were engaged in unloading boxes from a freight car. There was evidence that the conductor was drunk at the time; that in the month previous his habits were known to defendant and he had promised to reform; and that since such promise his heavy drinking had been notorious. Held, the question of defendant's negligence was properly left to the jury.—Johnson v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 162 Mich. 301.

§ 67q. Jury questions as to knowledge of and assumption of risk.

Doctrine of assumption of risk, see ante § 56.
Evidence as to assumption of risk, see ante § 65k.
Directing verdict on ground that risk assumed, see post § 70b.
Instructions as to assumption of risk, see post § 71f.

¶ 1644. Whether a workman employed in constructing a sewer should, in the exercise of due care, have known of the fact that the earth had been loosened three years before by reason of an excavation for a water main a few feet distant, thereby increasing the danger of a cave-in, and should therefore be held to have assumed the risk as incident to his employment, is a question for the jury.—Ostrander v. City of Lansing, 111 Mich. 693.

¶ 1645. An employee on a vessel was directed, by the mate, with other employees to throw a staging over the side and scrape the outside of the vessel. While he went to get some pails the other employees swung the staging over by means of a rope with a loop at each end into which the ends of the plank were inserted, so that there was nothing to prevent the plank from tipping. Deceased was thrown into the water and drowned and action was brought for his death. Held that he did not as a matter of law assume the risk, though by minute examination he might have seen that the rope was not so fastened as to prevent the plank from tipping.—Rick v. Saginaw Bay Towing Co., 132 Mich. 237.

¶ 1646. The question of whether an employee killed by being thrown into a coal conveyor by the tipping of a plank in a walk alongside the conveyor had discovered the danger in his work is for the jury in the absence of any evidence of such knowledge or evidence that it was clearly apparent.—Clark v. Wolverine Portland Cement Co., 138 Mich. 673.

¶ 1647. In an action for wrongful death of an employee, evidence that he was killed by falling into a coal conveyor on account of a loose plank in the walk alongside the conveyor is sufficient to go to the jury on the question of the assumption of the risk, although the employee had been performing the same duty for two weeks, the fact that the plank was loose could have been discovered by pushing it with the foot, and there is testimony that at times it would rock under foot.—Clark v. Wolverine Portland Cement Co., 138 Mich. 673.

¶ 1648. The question of whether a telephone lineman knew that he was not insulated by being upon a dry cedar pole is one of fact for the jury.—De Kallands v. Washtenaw Home Tel. Co., 153 Mich. 25.

¶ 1649. The question of whether a telephone lineman knew that live telephone wires which were in contact with his body were grounded, or would be grounded by a wire which got away from his helper, is one of fact for the jury.—De Kallands v. Washtenaw Home Tel. Co., 153 Mich. 25.

¶ 1650. A servant does not as a matter of law assume the risk of a defect in a piece of steel which requires a chemical and microscopic examination to disclose.—Potvin v. West Bay City Shipbuilding Co., 156 Mich. 201.

¶ 1651. Where a notice: "Danger. Keep off." posted on an elevator in a building, has been regularly disregarded by defendant's employees and no effort made to enforce it, and the same is removed two or three weeks before the accident in question, plaintiff employee is not barred as a matter of law from recovering for personal injuries sustained through the falling of the elevator, on the ground that he knew of the notice and assumed the risk.—Johnson v. Burke, 167 Mich. 349.

¶ 1652. Plaintiff, an expert lineman in employ of defendant, received a shock and injury while taking hold of a guy wire used to brace one of defendant's poles upon which plaintiff was working. The pole was at a corner and the stress tended to cause the live wires to break the pins, sag down, and come in contact with the braces, which in turn communicated the current to the guy wire in question. Shortly before the accident said guy wire had become charged and repairs were made by other linemen of defendant, defendant having knowledge thereof. When plaintiff was sent to work upon said poles, he was not informed of said fact. Held, he did not as a matter of law assume the risk.—Huber v. Twin City General Electric Co., 168 Mich. 531.

¶ 1653. Where a servant points out that a tool is defective and the master tells him to go ahead using it until it can be repaired, it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the master did not promise to repair the tool so as to relieve the servant of assuming the risk.—Brouseau v. Kellogg Switchboard & Supply Co., 158 Mich. 312. (Brooke, Grant and McAlvay, JJ., dissenting.)

¶ 1654. Plaintiff, a laborer, employed by defendant in its shipyard, was directed to carry iron grate bars up ladders and to lay them upon the deck of a vessel. Upon reaching the top of the ladders plaintiff had to step about one foot high over a railing and upon the deck. After making some sixteen trips up one ladder, he was directed by the foreman to use the other ladder. As he reached the top he stepped on the freshly painted deck of the vessel and was injured. Held, plaintiff should not be held as a matter of law to have assumed the risk.—Orso v. Great Lakes Engineering Works, 164 Mich. 568.

¶ 1655. Plaintiff, a foreman in the employ of defendant truck company, was lowering a tank at the time of his injury. He had been with various truck companies for about fifteen years and had equal, if not greater experience in the work than the officer, of the company. The ropes to be used were selected by him. An officer of the company and plaintiff noticed that the lead line was fraying on the edge of the tank and on such officer's order plaintiff mounted the tank to clear it. The weight of the tank was known to him. When the line was freed it broke and plaintiff was injured. Held, as a matter of law that plaintiff assumed the risk of injury and that the legal aspect of the case is not changed even if it is assumed that the rope was provided and selected by defendant.—Coleman v. Turner Cartage Co., 174 Mich. 231.

¶ 1656. Where an inexperienced municipal employee ordered to calk pipes in an uncurbed trench is assured of the safety of the place and does not hear an order to another workman to watch and warn, and is injured by the trench caving in, whether he assumed the risk is a question for the jury.—Keenan v. City of Mt. Pleasant, 176 Mich. 620.

¶ 1657. Whether a trench in which an employee was commanded to work was so obviously dangerous as to charge him with the assumption of the risk of injury, is a question for the jury, where he continued his work after the attention of his foreman had been called to the danger of a cave-in which the latter refused to remedy.—Baucino v. Fitzpatrick, 186 Mich. 1.

¶ 1658. Where a servant employed as a hoisting engineer by defendant was ordered to do some riveting upon a smokestack eighty-five feet from the ground, the work being dangerous in character and the servant being inexperienced, in an action for his death due to falling from the scaffold it was held that the risk was not assumed as matter of law.—Lobenstein v. Whitehead & Kales Iron Works, 179 Mich. 279.

¶ 1659. In an action by a foreman in charge of a gin pole and engaged in erecting the iron and steelwork of a building for damages for personal injuries sustained as a result of the falling of the pole because of the insufficiency of the platform on which it rested, held that it was a question for the jury whether defendant's superintendent promised to repair the platform and whether plaintiff assumed the risk.—Barkow v. Donovan Wire & Iron Co., 190 Mich. 563.

¶ 1660. What constitutes a reasonable time during which an employee may, without assuming the risk of injury, remain in an employment in reliance upon the promise of his master to remedy a defect, is generally a question for the jury depending on the facts of each particular case.—Cole v. Mamer Brick Co., 183 Mich. 290.

§ 67r. ——Employees in and about factories, shops and mills.

¶ 1661. In an action against an employer for an injury caused by his setting plaintiff, a boy of thirteen years old, at work upon a dangerous machine, it is not proper to instruct the jury that if the employee was properly instructed the employer would not be liable; where the questions whether the machine was dangerous, and whether the boy was too young to understand its dangerous nature, were also in the case and on the evidence were for the jury.—Steller v. Hart, 65 Mich. 644.

¶ 1662. In an action for personal injuries of an operator at a saw, it is proper to submit to the jury the question of whether or not the operator knew or ought to have known of the defective condition of the saw.—Chilson v. Lansing Wagon Works, 128 Mich. 43.

¶ 1663. The question of whether an infant employee knew or should have known the danger confronting him, and assumed the risk, was properly submitted to the jury, in an action for the death of such infant caused by being caught in the gearing of his employer's machinery; where it appears that such infant, a boy of 14, was employed to gather the scrap as it fell from the shearing machines in defendant's iron mill, and bind the fagots in bundles, that the space in which he worked was about 6 or 7 feet wide between the machinery and the wall of the mill, and with an exit at one end; that as deceased was working at the further end of this space other employees piled bundles of fagots in this space, under the direction of the foreman, to a height of about three feet, that this obstruction was directly opposite an exposed gearing, about 5 or 6 feet above the floor, that in the course of his employment it became necessary for deceased to pass out of this passage, which, attempting to do by crawling over such obstruction, he was caught in such exposed gearing and killed, that up to the day of his death such infant had worked at smaller shears in another part of the mill, and that the instruction given to him on beginning his employment as a mill hand was to be careful and not get his hands where he would get hurt.—McDonald v. Champion Iron & Steel Co., 140 Mich. 401.

¶ 1664. In an action for personal injuries, where it appears from the evidence that the servant knowing the defective condition of a machine drew the attention of the master thereto and continued working thereon upon the repeated promises that it would be remedied, the question whether he assumed the risk is one for the jury and it is error to direct a verdict.—Eligh v. Goldie, 143 Mich. 596.

¶ 1665. Where an employee complains of the looseness of a belt on machinery twice in a single day, and is assured each time that the belt will be repaired in a little while, and is ordered back to work, and is injured about an hour after his second complaint, it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that he worked such an unreasonable time after discovering this defect and after the promise of defendant to repair it, that he should be held to have assumed the risk.—Krohn v. Joseph N. Smith & Co., 151 Mich. 247.

¶ 1666. A part of the duty of plaintiff, a bright boy of fifteen, was to shift the belt to a loose pulley, in order to stop his machine. He testified that he saw his boss and others make the shift, and that he did it in the same way several times, successfully; that he had no instructions from his boss; and that he was injured while attempting to shift in the manner as aforesaid. Defendant testified that plaintiff had been previously warned that he was making the shift incorrectly, and was properly instructed. Held, that the question whether the plaintiff assumed the risk was for the jury, and the trial court was right in refusing to direct a verdict for defendant.—Lehto v. Atlantic Min. Co., 152 Mich. 412.

¶ 1667. One of the two cables supporting the elevator, which plaintiff was employed to run, broke. Plaintiff consulted his superior as to the safety of running with one cable, and was told to go ahead. The cable broke, and he was injured. There was evidence that some wires were broken in the cable causing it to fray, and there was a fracture and hidden weaknesses in it unknown to the plaintiff. Held, it was for the jury to say whether plaintiff assumed the risk.—Wilson v. Escanaba Woodenware Co., 152 Mich. 540.

¶ 1668. Where the servant knew before the day on which he was injured that the steam capacity of machinery which he was operating was inadequate, but was assured by the foreman that the machinery would be all right, that is, that it would run steadily, the question whether he assumed the risk on the day of the injury was one for the jury.—Burgess v. Humphrey Bookcase Co., 156 Mich. 345.

¶ 1669. Whether a servant knew that the steam capacity of machinery which he was operating was inadequate to render such operation reasonably safe was a question for the jury, where it was open to them to infer either that the servant continued to work after making a discovery of its inadequacy or that the discovery and injury to him was simultaneous.—Burgess v. Humphrey Bookcase Co., 156 Mich. 345.

¶ 1670. Plaintiff, sixteen years old, was taken from his accustomed line of work in a tannery and set to operate the extract wheel, with which work he was unfamiliar. One Mills, who was in authority in this department and to whom the men came for directions, ordered the plaintiff to climb upon the belt pulley of the extract wheel, some eleven feet from the floor, and turn the same, in order that Mills might fix a screw in a line-shaft pulley. While pulling on the said pulley, it suddenly turned, and plaintiff fell and was injured. Held, it was for the jury to pass on the question whether plaintiff assumed the risk.—Belmer v. Boyne City Tanning Co., 160 Mich. 669.

¶ 1671. Plaintiff prior to his injury had been employed in and about defendant's caustic soda plant, had helped to take out and put in the kettles used for boiling, and had shoveled the finished product. He was injured while cleaning a kettle pit by a piece of the soda flying up and burning his eye. While so engaged plaintiff had on gloves and his feet were wrapped in bags or cloths, but he was not told the purpose of this protection. Held, it was a question for the jury whether plaintiff assumed the risk.—Dascho v. Michigan Alkali Co., 168 Mich. 612.

¶ 1672. Whether plaintiff, an edgerman in defendant's mill, assumed the risk of "fly backs" occasioned by the use of set screws in the collars of the edger for the purpose of tightening the saws, resulting in their being thrown out of plumb, is a question for the jury when the contract of employment did not bind him to make repairs.—Cousineau v. Embury, 171 Mich. 23.

¶ 1673. Where plaintiff was injured while oiling a fan operated by a belt, and the cause of the injury was a defect in the belt because of which his hand was forced into the fan, whether its condition was known to plaintiff so that he was cognizant of the danger of oiling the fan as he did, was a question for the jury.—Cummins v. Boyne City Tanning Co., 177 Mich. 217.

§ 67s. ——Railroad employees.

¶ 1674. Whether a danger was obvious, and plaintiff's decedent knew of it, or by reasonable care might have known of it, so as to assume the risk, are questions for the jury.—Gilbert v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 161 Mich. 73.

¶ 1675. Where a railroad brakeman sues the company for injuries caused by his stepping into a hole in the road-bed while uncoupling a car on a side-track, in the absence of evidence as to how long before the accident he had been in defendant's employ, or that he ever had seen the said track before the accident, it cannot be said as a matter of law that the injury occurred from a risk assumed by plaintiff.—Ragon v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co., 91 Mich. 379.

¶ 1676. Where, owing to ice upon the tracks at a point where there was a slight depression in the road-bed a car backing upon a side track was derailed, killing a brakeman, it was for the jury to say, the fact not being undisputed, whether decedent knew or should have known of the depression, and should therefore be held to have assumed the incident risks.—Balhoff v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 106 Mich. 606.

¶ 1677. One injured while employed in putting in a bridge, by the falling of a girder, cannot be said, as a matter of law, to have assumed the risk of a rope's proving insufficient to support the weight of the girder, where he claims to have had no knowledge of any defect in the rope, and it appears that he was not himself engaged in using it at the time of the accident.—Thomas v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 114 Mich. 59.

¶ 1678. A brakeman killed while between cars to uncouple them because of his foot being caught between a rail and planks of a crossing, cannot be held to have assumed the risk of the defective crossing, as a matter of law, where the evidence shows that he did switching at some forty other crossings.—Fluhrer v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 121 Mich. 212.

¶ 1680. It was a jury question whether the danger to be apprehended from the recoil of a tightly strung wire when cut was as obvious to a section foreman to whom such wires were a novelty as to the vice principal who directed it to be done without giving any special warning.—Walker v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 104 Mich. 606, per Montgomery, J., and McGrath, C. J.

¶ 1681. The question whether a lineman assumed the risk of injury from using a vise to draw up trolley wires upon a curve, the employee being injured by the wire slipping, is for the jury where the plaintiff testifies that he was not acquainted with the dangers of his employment, and was not familiar with the tools to be used, and that he relied upon the statement of his superior that the vise was a suitable tool, which statements are denied by the defendant, who insists that the tool was reasonably safe for the use to which it was put.—Shadford v. Ann Arbor St. Ry. Co., 121 Mich. 224.

¶ 1682. In an action for personal injuries, where plaintiff was injured through a defective valve in a steam pipe used in connection with a pump, and where it appeared that plaintiff had complained of the condition and that the employer had promised that it would be repaired as soon as certain workmen returned, and where 30 days elapsed after this promise and before the injury, and where plaintiff testified that he daily expected the return of the workmen, the court could not hold as a matter of law that the plaintiff might not have reasonably expected a performance of the promise any time up to the date of the injury.—Mann v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 124 Mich. 641.

¶ 1683. Whether the defect in a 35-foot wooden ladder attached to a water tank, was obvious or discoverable by the ordinary care of one using the ladder, was a question for the jury, in an action for damages for plaintiff's fall from such ladder; where the evidence shows that the ladder had been in position from 12 to 15 years, that the slats were set in notches and fastened with nails, that the ladder had been properly tested six months prior to the accident, at which time no defects were found, that there were no obvious defects when plaintiff used the ladder, that one of the slats pulled loose and caused plaintiff to fall, that the nails which held the slat to one of the timbers had pulled out on one side of the ladder where there was a spot of decayed wood in the timber, and that when the slat was in position this decayed portion was hidden from view.—Nichols v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 145 Mich. 643.

¶ 1684. Whether the danger to which an injured employee was subjected is obvious where he was injured while obeying orders of an alleged incompetent foreman in getting under a loaded freight car which was held up by jacks under either corner, wooden horses being placed under the car to help sustain the weight, and which fell killing him, is a question of fact for the jury.—McClure v. Detroit Southern R. Co., 146 Mich. 457.

¶ 1685. Defendant railway's contract with all its switchmen stipulated that all hose on passenger trains after their arrival at stations should be cut by car men and not by switchmen. Plaintiff's decedent, a switchman, was injured while cutting the hose of a particular train at the direction of the yardmaster. The evidence was contradictory as to whether plaintiff's decedent had for sometime engaged in the cutting of hose despite the provisions of the contract. Held, the court could not hold as a matter of law that plaintiff's decedent had waived the terms of the schedule and assumed the risk.—Baker v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 169 Mich. 609. (Stone, Brooke, Ostrander and Steere, JJ., dissenting.)

¶ 1686. Plaintiff's decedent, a switchman, was working under the authority of the yardmaster. The deceased asked the yardmaster, whether he should cut off the last coach of a certain train and the yardmaster replied, "yes." The contract of defendant railway with the switchmen provided that the car men and not the switchmen should cut the cars. Held, it was a question for the jury whether the decedent had voluntarily assumed the risk of cutting off the coach so as to bar the recovery of the plaintiff for his death resulting therefrom.—Baker v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 169 Mich. 609.

¶ 1687. Where plaintiff employed as a brakeman on one of defendant's dump trains, is injured in a collision, it being claimed the premises were not properly lighted so that the engineer could see the other train, it cannot be said as a matter of law that this was a risk incident to plaintiff's employment.—Murphy v. Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co., 175 Mich. 216.

¶ 1688. In an action by an employee of a railway construction company for damages for personal injuries due to being brushed off a flat car, on which he was riding, by a push car which was on a siding and too near the main track, held that the submission to the jury of the question whether the engineer should have discovered the push car and stopped his train in time to avoid the collision was not error, where it appeared that for several miles north of the point of the collision, from which direction the train was coming, the track was straight and level, and the collision occurred a few minutes before 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and the push car could have been seen for several hundred feet north of the switch.—Adamski v. Michigan Ry. Engineering Co., 197 Mich. 561.

§ 67t. ——Employees in and about quarries and mines.

¶ 1689. Whether the deceased, a "hitch cutter," who prepared footings for timbering, had knowledge of the danger of a top fall equal to that possessed by his employer was for the jury on the facts considered with evidence that the "hitch cutters" were directed by the defendant to examine each place where they were about to go to work, and to satisfy themselves, before beginning the work, that the place was safe; that they were frequently cautioned as to this duty, and were warned against working, under any circumstances, beneath overhanging ground, without assuring themselves that it was safe; that they were allowed to take all the time and have all the assistance necessary to make it safe, if they considered it dangerous; and that they understood that this was one of their particular duties, and that no one would go ahead of them to perform it.—Andrews v. Tamarack Min. Co., 114 Mich. 375.

¶ 1690. The elevator in a mining shaft was operated by an engine stationed on the second story of the shaft house. The signal to the engineer was given by means of a wire running up to the engine room, by a signal man stationed at the bottom of the shaft. The rules were that only the signal man should give signals, but it was possible for any one at the landing at the first story of the shaft house to give the signal by means of the wire. Plaintiff was injured while attempting to alight from the elevator at the first story landing, the signal having been given by some person. Plaintiff was familiar with the signal system. Held, it was a question for the jury whether he assumed the risks incident to the place of his employment.—Delbusso v. American Cement Plaster Co., 165 Mich. 318.

¶ 1691. Plaintiff was injured through falling rock while working on the face of a quarry. It appeared that it had been the practice of the foreman to examine the condition of the face of the quarry after each blast. The foreman placed plaintiff at work without warning him of any danger from falling rock or in any way calling his attention to the fact that blasting had been done, and that no examination had taken place. Held, that the question of assumption of a risk is one for the jury.—Druck v. Antrim Lime Co., 167 Mich. 154.

¶ 1692. It cannot be said as a matter of law that a trammer in a mine, killed when a trolley wire struck him, knew of its defective condition though the evidence tends to show that the wire was loose from its clamp and sagging 24 hours before the accident and was tied up with fuse and it appears that immediately before the accident deceased was riding on a motor when it came to the place of the defective clamp, and that the wire was again loose and the operator stopped the motor and placed the wire on the top of the end of the clamp from which position it subsequently fell against deceased, where such operator did not know whether deceased saw his action. —Meola v. Quincy Min. Co., 174 Mich. 305.

¶ 1693. An exploring shaft in a mine was descended into by means of a series of short ladders which were nailed together and nailed to the timbers placed in said shaft. Employees also descended into same by means of a large bucket let down by a cable. Two of the ladders were so joined together that a space was left between the rounds equivalent to a space left by a missing round. Plaintiff employee was being lowered in said bucket into said shaft. A pump boy wishing to get into said bucket started to climb down the ladder and coming to the said missing round fell through the ladder, and down upon said bucket, knocking plaintiff off and injuring him. Plaintiff knew of said missing round in said ladder. Held, he could not be held as a matter of law to have assumed the risk of the accident.—Menere v. Cooper Range Consol. Co., 169 Mich. 367.

¶ 1694. Whether a miner assumed the risk of injury from a piece of uninsulated electric wire in a narrow passage in a mine is a question for the jury depending upon his opportunity to observe it, and whether his failure to do so was due to inattention or indifference.—Hazzard v. Consolidated Coal Co., 183 Mich. 363.

¶ 1695. Whether a person employed to work on the ground to assist in stringing wires on high towers, comprehending the risk of injury so as to assume the risk from obeying an order of his superior, who failed to give any instructions, to climb a tower and loosen a wire drawn tight by a team attached to it, held properly submitted to the jury.—Hemmila v. Cleveland Cliffs Iron Co., 184 Mich. 567.

Contributory negligence of servant, see ante § 59.
Burden of proof as to contributory negligence, see ante § 62b.
Presumptions as to contributory negligence, see ante § 63b.
Evidence as to contributory negligence, see ante §§ 64h, 65 l.
Directing verdict on ground of contributory negligence, see post § 70d.
Instructions as to contributory negligence, see post § 71g.

¶ 1696. It cannot be said as matter of law that a servant was guilty of contributory neglect in leaving his assigned place of work in a factory room and going to the other side of the room where he was struck and killed by a flying knife thrown by a cutter head revolving in a horizontal plane, it being as likely to fly one way as another and though he had no permission or occasion to go there.—Marshall v. Widdicomb Furniture Co., 67 Mich. 167.

¶ 1697. In a particular case where plaintiff was injured while adjusting a machine which he was employed to run, the question of his contributory negligence was held to have been properly submitted to the jury. —Shumway v. Walworth & N. Mfg. Co., 98 Mich. 411.

¶ 1698. A fireman on a steam derrick assisting the engineer in oiling a derrick chain is not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to close the derrick doors to guard against a possible contingency of falling through such doors where such contingency was so remote that no ordinary man would have foreseen it.—Bernard v. Pittsburg Coal Co., 137 Mich. 279.

¶ 1699. Whether a servant is guilty of contributory negligence is a question for the jury, where in pulling a truck he backed into an open shaft.—Murphy v. Grand Rapids Veneer Works, 142 Mich. 677.

¶ 1700. Contributory negligence of plaintiff lineman in ascending a pole decayed at the heart is properly left to the jury, where the pole was erected two years before the time it fell under him and where at the time it fell a wire was being stretched which might have put a strain on the pole, the facts being such that the jury might properly have found him justified in assuming that it was sound and sufficient when erected and such that if it was then sound they might have also found that the strain put on it would have been safely carried.—Livingway v. Houghton County St. Ry. Co., 145 Mich. 86.

¶ 1701. A servant is not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in using an unduly tempered piece of steel, from which a piece chips off and strikes him, where, under the evidence, there is a question for the jury as to whether excess of phosphorus in the steel or the hardening of the head of the piece had anything to do with the accident and it is conceded that the steel was in the first place the proper kind for making the tool.—Potvin v. West Bay City Shipbuilding Co., 156 Mich. 201.

¶ 1702. Plaintiff employee was lying on a pile of blocks discharging his duty of removing them from an elevator shaft, and in that position was near the revolving coupling of a line shaft. He testified that he slipped off the pile, and into a projecting bolt in the coupling, and was injured. Held, it was a question for the jury whether plaintiff was contributorily negligent.—MacDonald v. Freeman Mfg. Co., 160 Mich. 380.

¶ 1703. Plaintiff was employed to assist in pouring molten metal from a large ladle into molds. For that purpose small ladles were used which were gathered up each day and put in an open shed outside the shop, by a man who worked about the shop. Plaintiff went as usual and got from the shed one of the ladles which without his knowledge contained a little rain water. Upon the molten metal's being poured into said ladle an explosion occurred and plaintiff was injured by the flying molten metal. Defendant had not instructed plaintiff as to the danger of receiving molten metal into a vessel containing water. Held, plaintiff was not contributorily negligent, but such question was properly left to the jury.—Borkowski v. American Radiator Co., 165 Mich. 266.

¶ 1704. Where plaintiff, a cripple, had for months been using a stairway without hand rails, its continued use by him was not contributory negligence, as a matter of law, but a question for the jury.—Davis v. Buss Machine Works, 175 Mich. 61.

¶ 1705. In an action for personal injuries sustained by a yard employee while unloading boilers, evidence that plaintiff stayed on the boiler while it was being moved held sufficient to require the submission of the question of contributory negligence, to the jury.—Charters v. Industrial Works, 179 Mich. 1.

¶ 1706. An employee riding a bicycle through the power room of the factory in which he was employed, on his way from work, injured by falling into an unguarded engine pit upon running over an air hose which had been lying on the floor for several days, is guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.—Schwager v. Saginaw Plate Glass Co., 179 Mich. 360.

¶ 1707. Where a teamster in charge of a dray placed himself in such a position as to be injured by the slipping of a chain furnished by a carrier and attached to a piece of steel by servant of the consignee, which was being unloaded from a car and placed on the dray in his charge, he is guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.—Shadduck v. Grand Rapids & I. Ry. Co., 179 Mich. 433.

¶ 1708. In an action by a factory employee against the owners for damages for injuries received as a result of his clothing becoming entangled in projecting unguarded set screws in removable chucks used for holding logs in place in a rotary veneer peeler, evidence held insufficient to establish that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in blindly selecting a chuck with set screws, and failing to observe them.—Edward v. Grand Haven Basket Factory, 187 Mich. 505.

¶ 1709. The lever of the clutch apparatus used for starting a milling machine was repaired in the afternoon, shortly before the hour of plaintiff's injury. The repair man failed to put in a cotter pin in a bolt in the lever. The bolt worked loose, and plaintiff, in attempting to operate the lever, was injured. Held, he was not as a matter of law guilty of contributory negligence in failing to discover the absence of the cotter pin.—Deary v. Hecla Co., 161 Mich. 677.

§ 68a. ——Inexperienced or youthful employees.

¶ 1710. Where a boy under sixteen was injured at an employment requiring the use of a machine through which large metal sheets were run, and he had not been instructed in the use of the machine, the question as to his judgment in acting as he did at the time of the injury is one for the jury to determine.—Sterling v. Union Carbide Co., 142 Mich. 284.

¶ 1711. Where a boy of sixteen years was engaged in operating a stamping press, and with regard to the instruction given him defendant's foreman testified that he took plaintiff over to the press and started to operate it, ran it a little while, and showed plaintiff how to do it, and then watched plaintiff after he had gone to work at it, until he felt sure that plaintiff understood it, and then left him, the question of plaintiff's contributory negligence under such instructions, is for the jury.—Clemens v. Gem Fibre Package Co., 153 Mich. 495.

¶ 1712. Plaintiff employee was directed by defendant to leave his regular work, and help put a tram car which had jumped the track, back on the rails. He had no previous experience at this and was given no instructions. He used a crowbar and a ratchet lifting jack. While attempting to pry the car over, the car slipped and plaintiff was injured. Held, it was error for the trial court to hold as a matter of law that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.—Johnson v. Desmond Chemical Co., 156 Mich. 669.

¶ 1713. The duty of the plaintiff, aged fourteen, was to remove boards after they came through the defendant's planing machine. In attempting to remove from the mill a small piece of wood which plaintiff thought would interfere with the operation of the machine, plaintiff's hand was drawn by the suction of a dust collecting apparatus into the machine. Held, that plaintiff, not being warned of the danger of the suction, was not as a matter of law guilty of contributory negligence.—Lund v. Sargent Mfg. Co., 158 Mich. 3.

¶ 1714. Plaintiff, sixteen years old, was taken from his accustomed line of work in a tannery and ordered to operate the extract wheel, with which he was unfamiliar. One Mills, who was in authority in this department and to whom the men came for directions, ordered the plaintiff to climb up on the belt pulley of the extract wheel, some eleven feet from the floor, and turn the same, in order that Mills might fix a screw in a lineshaft pulley. While pulling on the said pulley, it suddenly turned, and plaintiff fell and was injured. Held, it was for the jury to say whether the accident was unavoidable.—Belmer v. Boyne City Tanning Co., 160 Mich. 669.

¶ 1715. Plaintiff's deceased was employed by defendant to wheel sand to a mixer, and stay on shore as his part of the work in the construction of a dam. Defendant's superintendent ordered the deceased to take a scow and repair a leak which had sprung in the new dam. In the effort to reach the point of leakage the scow ran into some submerged timber braces used in the construction. The scow became unmanageable, got into the swift current of the sluiceway, and deceased was drowned. Defendant did not instruct deceased in his new duties or warn him of the hidden timbers. Held, the deceased was not, as a matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence.—Snow v. Escanaba Power Co., 162 Mich. 579.

¶ 1716. In a suit for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff while temporarily operating a molding machine in defendant's mill, the evidence was that plaintiff for a period of nine years had been employed as a common laborer to shovel coal and handle lumber about the mill; that occasionally and for brief periods of time, upon a shortage of hands, he operated some of the machines located in defendant's old building; that the molding machine in question located in defendant's new building differed in construction from those located in the old building; that plaintiff was called from his usual work as a common laborer to operate said machine on the occasion in question; that he informed defendant's foreman he did not know how to run said machine; that he was given no instructions or warnings; and that he was injured by invisible revolving knives while placing his hand upon the bed plate of said machine in an attempt to discover, while standing at the rear of the same, the reason for its failure to work properly. Held, plaintiff was not as a matter of law guilty of contributory negligence.—Molyneaux v. Bradley, Miller & Co., 167 Mich. 278. (Ostrander, C. J., dissenting.)

¶ 1717. A ladder way into an exploration shaft of a mine was constructed by joining together several short ladders and nailing the same to the permanent timbers in said shaft. On account of a defect in the original construction of said ladder one of the rounds was missing. The persons expressly charged with duty of seeing that the ladder was safe knew about its defective construction and the dangers incident thereto. While plaintiff employee was being lowered into said shaft by means of a bucket and a cable, a pump boy started to descend said ladder for the purpose of boarding said bucket, fell through the space left by said missing round, and struck and knocked plaintiff off said bucket. Held, plaintiff was not as a matter of law guilty of contributory negligence in failing to repair said defect in the ladder or to take steps to remove the danger, although he knew of the same.—Menere v. Copper Range Consol. Co., 169 Mich. 367.

¶ 1718. Where an inexperienced municipal employee is ordered to calk pipes in an uncurbed trench five feet deep and is assured of the safety, whether working in a reclining position, instead of standing up so as to more readily avoid danger from a cave in, is contributory negligence, is a question for the jury.—Keenan v. City of Mt. Pleasant, 176 Mich. 620.

¶ 1719. Where a boy under eighteen years of age in the course of his employment was compelled to stand in a narrow space between moving belts within an arm's length of revolving knives, and was injured by coming in contact with the knives in some manner which he was unable to explain, but evidently due to his hand coming in contact with one of the moving belts, his contributory negligence was held to be for the jury.—Radic v. Thomas Jackson & Co., Ltd., 178 Mich. 618.

¶ 1720. Whether a boy under eighteen years of age, who was placed at work at a dangerous machine in violation of Act No. 285, Pub. Acts 1909, § 4019, How. St., 2nd Ed., was guilty of contributory negligence, held a question for the jury when resting on conflicting testimony.—Powell v. E. H. Stafford Mfg. Co., 183 Mich. 1.

¶ 1721. Decedent, employed as a hoisting engineer, was ordered to do riveting upon a smokestack, eighty-five feet from the ground. The work was dangerous and no instruction was given to him. He was killed as the result of a fall from the scaffold upon which he was at work. Held contributory negligence was not shown as a matter of law.—Lobenstein v. Whitehead & Kales Iron Works, 179 Mich. 279.

¶ 1722. In an action for the death of a hoisting machine operator who had been ordered to help in the construction of a platform around a flue 85 feet high, where it appeared that deceased was inexperienced in such work and was not warned of the dangerous character of the work, held that the contributory negligence of deceased was a question for the jury.—Lobenstein v. Whitehead & Kales Iron Works, 192 Mich. 118.

§ 68b. ——Obedience to or disregard of rules, orders or warnings.

¶ 1723. Where a brakeman, on going into the employment of a railroad company, signs a contract binding him to obey all orders, rules and regulations, but in which the general language applies equally to all classes of employees, the agreement to obey all orders must be construed to apply to all which are issued to him in the line of duty in which he is employed; and it does not empower the company to assign him to other duties wholly disconnected therewith and differing therefrom. And while the clause binding him to use care and caution applies to anything he may undertake to do, it is for the jury to decide whether he has violated it.—Jones v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 49 Mich. 573.

¶ 1724. In an action for alleged negligence causing death, the jury is not bound by the testimony of a witness as to warning given deceased where his testimony upon cross-examination differs from that upon direct examination and is also contradicted by the fact that deceased in disregard of the alleged warning rushed into the danger and was killed.—Preuschoff v. B. Stroh Brewing Co., 132 Mich. 107.

¶ 1725. Contributory negligence is for the jury in an action for injury caused by plaintiff's clothing being caught by a projecting set screw, where it appeared that the light was dim and while he saw the revolving shaft he might not have seen the projecting screw, and that he took the position in the presence of the alter ego of the employer, and under directions witnessed by him.—Sipes v. Michigan Starch Co., 137 Mich. 258.

¶ 1726. A fireman on a steam derrick is not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, in obeying the directions of the engineer in oiling a derrick chain although there was a safer method of doing the oiling than that adopted by the engineer.—Bernard v. Pittsburg Coal Co., 137 Mich. 279.

¶ 1727. Plaintiff, an employee of defendant, was injured by being caught in unguarded gearing upon the breaking of a ladder upon which he was at work. Upon conflicting evidence as to whether it was part of plaintiff's duty to use the ladder in question or whether such use was against the orders of defendant, plaintiff's contributory negligence was held to be for the jury.—Smith v. Mt. Clemens Sugar Co., 179 Mich. 97.

¶ 1728. One experienced in the use of dynamite and the effects of explosions in blasting stumps who violates instructions to use light charges by using an unusually heavy charge of dynamite, and stands in the open to fire the blast, and fails to seek protection from flying pieces by stepping behind a brush pile which would have afforded adequate protection, and as a result was injured, is guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.—Gatewood v. Consolidated Coal Co., 192 Mich. 247.

§ 68c. ——Reliance on assurances of safety or promise to repair.

¶ 1729. Where, in an action for injuries received while using machinery known by plaintiff to be defective, there is no evidence that, in answer to complaints made by him, defendant promised to remedy the defects, it is error to submit to the jury the question of defendant's liability upon that theory.—Breig v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 98 Mich. 222.

¶ 1730. A lineman injured by a trolley wire slipping when being drawn up, upon a curve, due to the failure of a vise to hold the wire, cannot be said to be guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law, because of working from the inside of the curve, contrary to natural laws, whereby wire stretched upon a curve and held in place by a vise would be dangerous, where the plaintiff claims that he was not familiar with the work, that he was told by the foreman that it was safe to work on the inside of the curve, if the vise held fast to the guy wire, that it was necessary to work on the inside, and that it was just as dangerous to work on the outside of the curve.—Shadford v. Ann Arbor St. Ry. Co., 121 Mich. 224.

¶ 1731. Whether the danger of working where defects exist, under promise of repair, is so imminent that no prudent person would undertake to perform the service is usually a question of fact.—Glassbrook v. Lansing Wheelbarrow Co., 177 Mich. 29.

¶ 1732. In an action by a foreman in charge of a gin pole used in erecting the iron and steel work of a building for damages for personal injuries sustained as a result of the falling of the pole because of the insufficiency of the platform on which it rested, held that it was a question for the jury whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in continuing to work after a promise by defendant's superintendent to repair the platform.—Barkow v. Donovan Wire & Iron Co., 190 Mich. 563.

¶ 1733. Plaintiff was employed in fastening the tongs to poles to be raised and loaded on a wagon. He complained to defendant, his employer, that the tongs were dull, and slipped on the poles. Defendant told him to go ahead using them until they could be repaired. Plaintiff continued; the tongs kept slipping, and he was injured. Held, plaintiff was not as a matter of law guilty of contributory negligence in relying on defendant's advice, in view of the fact that others used the dull tongs after the accident.—Brouseau v. Kellogg Switchboard & Supply Co., 158 Mich. 312. (Brooke, Grant and McAlvay, JJ., dissenting.)

§ 68d. ——Contributory negligence of factory, shop, or mill employees.

¶ 1734. Whether it was negligent for plaintiff to attempt to oil with his left hand a buzz-saw while in motion was held properly submitted to the jury.—Ribble v. Starrat, 83 Mich. 140.

¶ 1735. If, in a damage case there is evidence, in effect, that the plaintiff, while at work at a saw in the defendant's mill stood on some loose boards covering a hole in the floor, and through these boards sliding apart was thrown forward upon the saw; that he had worked in the same place several weeks, but, according to his claim, did not know that the boards covered a hole; that the boards, though not nailed down, had remained in place a long time, and that the defendant knew of his dangerous surroundings, the question of contributory negligence is for the jury.—Smith v. Dunham, 74 Mich. 310.

¶ 1736. An operator at a wabble saw is not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in using a table known by him to be defective where the testimony tended to show that the table was defective, that it was not firm and rigid, that it was supported by strips which would work out and drop down and that he would put them back in whenever he saw them working out.—Chilson v. Lansing Wagon Works, 128 Mich. 43.

¶ 1737. The question whether an employee was occasionally compelled to put his hand between the feed rolls and the saws of a lath machine, held improperly submitted to the jury in the absence of evidence warranting it.—Lydman v. De Haas, 185 Mich. 128, 8 N. C. C. A. 649.

¶ 1738. The question whether it was necessary as a matter of custom, for an employee to place his hand between the feed rolls and saws of a lath machine, should not be submitted to the jury in the absence of evidence on the subject.—Lydman v. De Haas, 185 Mich. 128, 8 N. C. C. A. 649.

¶ 1739. In an action for damages against a shingle company for personal injuries received by a green employee in being brought into contact with a revolving saw while attempting to remove a sliver therefrom, it is for the jury to say whether under all the circumstances the saw was or was not a warning in itself and whether a plain menace of danger was not involved in seizing the silver as the plaintiff seized it.—Martin v. Jerry Madden Shingle Co., 168 Mich. 176.

¶ 1740. Where a person's hand was drawn into the rollers of a corn husker and injured, the fact that he used his hands in removing the débris accumulated in front of the rollers instead of sticks furnished for that purpose does not show contributory negligence as a matter of law when this was the method employed by his instructor.—Garfield v. Lapham, 173 Mich. 217.

¶ 1741. A workman employed in a sawmill to carry slabs from the gangplank, while pulling backwards at one that was too heavy for one man to carry, slipped on some wet bark and fell against certain cogwheels that caught his pantaloons and injured him. He had not been warned and did not know that the wheels were uncovered. Held, that the question whether he was guilty of contributory negligence ought to have been left to the jury.—Swoboda v. Ward, 40 Mich. 420.

¶ 1742. In an action by an employee who was injured while working on a pump located in a large mill, where it appeared that a throttle valve was so worn that when closed it leaked steam into the cylinder pump; that on the day of the injury plaintiff heard steam escaping into the well and went down to attend to it and reached his arm through the spokes of the flywheel to tighten a nut, and that because of the defective condition of the valve, steam escaped and started the pump going thus catching his arm and injuring his hand, and where a new pump was being erected, and there had been a promise to repair the throttle valve, as soon as absent workmen returned, and 30 days had gone by since the promise, and where the escaping steam had been sufficient to start the old pump, but the new one had not been so started until the occasion in question, the court could not hold as a matter of law that the plaintiff was so reckless as to preclude him from asserting a reliance on the promise to repair.—Mann v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 124 Mich. 641.

¶ 1743. Where an employee engaged in testing motors extends his hand through a flywheel for the purpose of adjusting a pulley and is injured by the sudden starting of the motor, it cannot be said that he was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law even though there was a safer way of adjusting the same—it appearing that there was no reasonable apprehension of the motor being started.—Johnson v. E. C. Clark Motor Co., 173 Mich. 277.

¶ 1744. Where plaintiff suing for a negligent injury has testified that he was forced against a shaft, his admissions to the effect that when injured he was hanging on the shaft with his arm over it do not preclude his recovery if the jury believe he was injured in the manner testified to, but go merely to his credibility.—King v. Ford River Lumber Co., 98 Mich. 172.

¶ 1745. It is for the jury to say whether a servant was negligent where he assumed a squatting posture in attempting to turn an air cock with a wrench, and, slipping on a greasy floor, fell against a moving belt from which at the time a guard had been removed of which removal he testified he was not aware, and where it was a question whether the situation and character of the belt and its nearness to him was not such that the want of the guard should have been noticed by him.—Swick v. Aetna Portland Cement Co., 147 Mich. 454, per Hooker and Carpenter, JJ., others concurring in the result.

¶ 1746. In a suit for injuries suffered by plaintiff employee engaged in cleaning out the vats used for washing pulp in a paper mill, the evidence indicated that, before defendant's millwrights came to repair the belt used in running the machinery in the vat, plaintiff shut off the power and tied the lever so that the belt could not shift from the loose to the tight pulley unless some one released it; that plaintiff got down into the tank to clean out the refuse so as to allow the trapdoor to close; and that in removing the belt from the loose pulley to repair it, the millwrights threw it into the driving pulley instead of taking it from the loose pulley as they might have done. The evidence was conflicting as to whether the millwrights warned plaintiff of his danger. Held, plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law and such question was properly left to the jury.—Courtois v. King Paper Co., 172 Mich. 305.

¶ 1747. Where plaintiff's eye was injured by a particle of dust while he was using an emery wheel, the question of his contributory negligence in not wearing goggles is for the jury where it appears that plaintiff did not see a sign informing the employees where the goggles could be obtained, which sign was covered with dust making it difficult to read, that plaintiff had been employed only a few days, that the other employees did not wear goggles and that the foreman said nothing about goggles when informing him how to do the work.—Drake v. Industrial Works, 174 Mich. 622.

¶ 1748. Plaintiff operated rattlers in a foundry. To start the machinery it was necessary to climb upon a barrel and adjust the belt upon a moving pulley by hand. It being a cold day, plaintiff wore mittens, one of which caught upon a wire hook in the belt and pulled plaintiff's arm between the belt and the pulley. Held, that plaintiff's contributory negligence was a question for the jury.—Glassbrook v. Lansing Wheelbarrow Co., 177 Mich. 29.

¶ 1749. Plaintiff was injured while adjusting a belt to set in motion rattlers in a foundry. To adjust the belt it was necessary to climb upon a barrel and throw the belt while the line shaft was in motion, no loose pulley having been provided as required by statute. He knew the danger but continued to work on promise of repairs soon to be made. Held, plaintiff was not negligent as a matter of law.—Glassbrook v. Lansing Wheelbarrow Co., 177 Mich. 29.

¶ 1750. Where an employee was injured by being caught by exposed gearing upon the breaking of a ladder upon which he was at work, the gears in question being situated about nine feet from the floor and about three feet from the side of the ladder, it was held that his contributory negligence was for the jury.—Smith v. Mt. Clemens Sugar Co., 179 Mich. 97.

¶ 1751. Where an employee was injured by being caught in exposed gearing upon the breaking of a ladder upon which he was at work, it was held that he was not as a matter of law guilty of contributory negligence in using a ladder which had been broken and mended.—Smith v. Mt. Clemens Sugar Co., 179 Mich. 97.

§ 68e. ——Contributory negligence of employees in and about mines.

¶ 1752. It is for the jury to decide whether an experienced employee is guilty of contributory negligence in passing from a pit mine by way of an inclined track upon which a "skip-car" is run and which track is generally used by the men, it being the most convenient though not the only way of reaching the mine.—Luke v. Wheat Mining Co., 71 Mich. 364.

¶ 1753. While passing from a pit mine on an inclined track upon which a "skip-car" used in taking out ore was run, and which track was generally used by the men, it being the most convenient though not the only way of reaching the mine, an old employee was struck by the descending car lowered by the foreman's direction without the usual signal or warning. In an action for the injury received, held, that the question of plaintiff's contributory negligence was for the jury.—Luke v. Wheat Mining Co., 71 Mich. 364.

¶ 1754. Where plaintiff, a night-worker in defendant's mine, was injured by the fall of some staging because of a displaced brace, and the work of bracing and supporting the timber was done in the daytime, and it appeared that plaintiff, who was an experienced miner, knew that the staging was not steadied by a certain method which was safer than the one employed, and that he did not discover the displaced brace, he could not be said, as matter of law, to have been guilty of contributory negligence.—Eddy v. Aurora Iron Mining Co., 81 Mich. 548.

¶ 1755. Plaintiff had formerly been employed as a timberman in the fifteenth level of defendant's mine. He left the mine for a time, and then returned to work on the same level. Meanwhile defendant had built a chute or raise directly under the iron rail track in the fifteenth level, and leading down to the sixteenth level. The raise was seven feet long and four feet wide, the hole extending out about one foot on each side of the track. The only passage across the raise or "chute" was a car track with board planking between the rails which were two feet apart. Plaintiff worked for some time in the mine and passed the chute many times. A light was customarily put there as a warning, but there was evidence that it was absent on the occasion in question. Plaintiff was never told of the chute, and did not learn of it until the injury. Held, the question of plaintiff's contributory negligence was one for the jury.—Kaukola v. Oliver Iron Mining Co., 159 Mich. 689.

¶ 1756. Plaintiff was employed by defendant mining company and stationed in its shaft house as a lander on the tram track and as a bell man. A trestle led out from the shaft house curving to the right. Loaded cars ran out on this trestle and when unloaded were drawn back by a cable which was operated by an engine stationed some distance from the shaft house. The engineer operated his engine only upon signal from the plaintiff. Once or twice just preceding the accident, when the empty car was being drawn back, the cable slipped off the idlers of the trestle on account of the curve of the trestle, and fell down to the right of the trestle. Plaintiff went out upon the trestle on these occasions, replaced the cable on the idlers, and walked back on the left side of the trestle where there was a considerable space for going on foot, while the right side of the trestle afforded only a narrow footing outside the rails. On the occasion of the injury, plaintiff went out again to place the cable back on the idlers, and having done so, signaled the engineer to draw in the empty car and started to walk back on the right side, or narrow portion of the trestle. While so walking the cable slipped off the idlers and knocked plaintiff off the trestle causing his injury. Held, plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, since he knew that if the cable slipped off it would come off upon the right side and place him in danger of being injured.—Dolstrom v. Newport Min. Co., 165 Mich. 309.

¶ 1757. The plaintiff, a miner, was injured by falling rock. It appeared that the plaintiff had thought that the rock was dangerous a month before the accident, but on the assurance of the shift boss that the place would be timbered had continued his work. Held, that the question of negligence in assuming the risk was properly submitted to the jury.—Asplund v. Calumet & Hecla Min. Co., 177 Mich. 529.

¶ 1758. Whether a miner used due care in traversing a narrow passage in a mine without waiting until the electric current was turned off from the wires therein, or whether he should have seen or heard an approaching car which compelled him to step aside from the track and lean against the wall where he was injured by coming in contact with an exposed wire, or whether he should have chosen another passage, are questions for the jury.—Hazzard v. Consolidated Coal Co., 183 Mich. 363.

¶ 1759. Whether it was contributory negligence for a miner in an emergency to ascend a ladder leading from a shaft instead of taking a bucket as he might have done, held a question for the jury in an action for personal injuries.—Benson v. Jones & Laughlin Ore Co., 185 Mich. 7. (Brooke, C. J., and Ostrander, J., concurring in reversal on ground that negligence was not shown.)

¶ 1760. Where a railroad employee was injured while riding upon the pilot of a locomotive in accordance with a custom and by the direction of his superiors any question of contributory negligence is for the jury.—Barschow v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 147 Mich. 226.

¶ 1761. Contributory negligence as a matter of law is not shown in an action by a section hand caused by the derailment of a hand car on which he was riding, though in a train which had just passed, he saw an open rack car loaded with planing mill refuse, and thought it was dangerous to so load it, but immediately followed the train on the hand car which was derailed by striking a piece of hardwood flooring which had fallen from the car.—McLean v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 137 Mich. 482.

¶ 1762. A section foreman, who, on a stormy morning, carelessly walks along a railroad track in the same direction as an approaching train without looking back and with the intention of cleaning a switch of snow, and is injured by the train, is guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.—Barnhart v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 188 Mich. 537.

¶ 1763. In an action by a section hand against a railroad company under Pub. Acts 1909, No. 104, How. St., 2nd Ed., §§ 4110-4116, to recover damages for personal injuries sustained while walking on the track in the same direction as an approaching train on a stormy day, held that the plaintiff's negligence was, as a matter of law, greater than that of the defendant.—Barnhart v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 188 Mich. 537.

¶ 1764. A servant of a railway construction company, who took his seat on the outside of a house car to watch the tools of the construction train, was not guilty of contributory negligence, in an action for injuries to such servant received in collision with cars negligently left upon a spur track, where the space he occupied was five or six feet long and he braced his foot against a projecting bolt, since such collision was a danger which he could not anticipate, and since it cannot be said as a matter of law that the risk of his being thrown off the car by its ordinary management was such that no person of ordinary prudence would have assumed it.—Milbourne v. Arnold Elec. Power Station Co., 140 Mich. 316.

¶ 1765. Plaintiff, a station agent of defendant railway, was injured by a conductor of defendant while they were engaged in unloading a freight car. The conductor was under the influence of liquor. Held, the question whether plaintiff was contributorily negligent in view of his knowledge of the conductor's condition was for the jury.—Johnson v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 162 Mich. 301.

§ 68g. ——Of brakemen and switchmen.

¶ 1766. A man who had been employed for one month in switching cars in defendant's yards was killed while in performance of his duties by being brushed between a car and a building maintained by defendant dangerously near a sidetrack on which the car was passing. It did not appear that the deceased had ever before switched a car on said sidetrack or past the building, or that he had any reason to apprehend the existence of special danger. Held, that the question of his contributory negligence was for the jury.—Sweet v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 87 Mich. 559.

¶ 1767. The question of plaintiff's contributory negligence in trying to uncouple cars while they were in motion was held to be for the jury.—Ashman v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 90 Mich. 567.

¶ 1768. Stepping between moving cars to uncouple them is not, as a matter of law, negligence, but the question is one for the jury.—Eastman v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 101 Mich. 597.

¶ 1769. Whether a brakeman, in sitting upon a flat car between two tiers of logs while backing upon a sidetrack for the purpose of making a coupling, was guilty of contributory negligence precluding a recovery for injuries sustained by being crushed between the logs on the car's leaving the track, is a question for the jury, the evidence being conflicting as to the danger of the position.—Balhoff v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 106 Mich. 606.

¶ 1770. In action for wrongful death of a brakeman while coupling cars the testimony of another brakeman, who saw the deceased go in front of the car which was being backed down for the coupling, to change the coupling link, that that was a part of deceased's duty as a brakeman, and was the proper thing to do, was sufficient to defeat the contention that the testimony showed the deceased to have been negligent as a matter of law.—Knapp v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 114 Mich. 199.

¶ 1771. In an action for wrongful death, the failure of a brakeman to detect defective blocking of a frog required by Comp. L. 1897, § 6313, to be kept in a safe condition and to avoid it in crossing the track in front of a moving car is not contributory negligence as a matter of law where the testimony goes to show that the defects were not easily discernible.—Jones v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 127 Mich. 198. (Hooker and Grant, JJ., dissenting.)

¶ 1772. In an action for personal injuries to a railroad brakeman, testimony that he was injured on account of a hole between the ties on the main track while walking between moving cars and not at a switch as contended by defendant raises a question of fact as to the plaintiff's contributory negligence.—Jarvis v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 128 Mich. 61.

¶ 1773. The following of a custom by a brakeman, in passing in front of moving cars in the performance of his duty, is not as a matter of law contributory negligence.—DeCair v. Manistee & G. R. R. Co., 133 Mich. 578.

¶ 1774. In a suit by a switchman for personal injuries received while engaged in coupling cars in defendant company's switchyard, it appearing that plaintiff tripped over a pile of gravel and fell in front of a moving train, evidence examined, and held to present a question for the jury whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.—Gillespie v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 150 Mich. 303.

¶ 1775. An employee who is injured while engaged in coupling cars upon a switch track at a factory, is not guilty of contributory negligence in going between cars where, from all the evidence which appeared in the record, he could have performed the duties which he undertook to do from between the cars where he had placed himself with perfect safety except for an intervening and unexpected propulsion of an additional car against the dead cars between which he was standing.—Pecard v. Menominee River Sugar Co., 153 Mich. 84.

¶ 1776. Where telephone wires are strung over defendant railway's track at a height lower than that required by law, a plaintiff brakeman, riding backwards on defendant's freight car in discharge of his duty, and in ignorance of the presence of said wires, is not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law for failure to turn around and look for such wires, although he might have seen the wires had he been facing forward.—Meyers v. Detroit & C. R. Co., 166 Mich. 403.

¶ 1777. A brakeman injured by collision between a derailed car and a pile of lumber is not as a matter of law guilty of contributory negligence in climbing up into the stirrup at the front end of the car, and holding to the ends of boards which were piled upon the car, and riding in that position.—Anderson v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 168 Mich. 207.

¶ 1778. On action against a railway company by a brakeman for injuries received when a conductor without his knowledge signaled an engineer to back into a car on which he was preparing a coupling, the brakeman's conduct in selecting the dangerous way of preparing the coupling is for the jury on the question of his negligence, where the car and engine were at rest when he started to prepare the coupling and he was not bound as a matter of law to apprehend that the conductor who had been absent would appear and signal for the coupling.—Wallin v. Arcadia & B. River Ry. Co., 172 Mich. 466.

¶ 1779. A brakeman who goes between moving cars to mount them is not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.—Scott v. Boyne City, G. & A. R. Co., 182 Mich. 514.

¶ 1780. The question of the contributory negligence of a brakeman who slipped and fell in front of a switch engine which, because of a defective brake, could not be stopped in time to avoid injuring him, held properly submitted to the jury.—Nelson v. Michigan Tanning & Extract Co., 184 Mich. 108.

§ 68h. ——Of conductors, engineers and motormen.

¶ 1781. Plaintiff street car conductor, being ordered by the foreman to take a certain car out of the barn, stepped in between the car and another five feet behind it, and threw the trolley on the wire without waiting for the motorman or looking to see if the motorman's switch was on. The car suddenly jumped back, injuring him. Defendant's rules contained a warning against placing the trolley wheel on the wire while the controller was on. Held, plaintiff was precluded as a matter of law from recovery on account of contributory negligence.—Drouillard v. Detroit United Ry., 170 Mich. 444.

¶ 1782. Plaintiff, motor car conductor, was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in descending from the top of an electric car of defendant, he having ascended in a manner not provided for by the company, and in the daytime, without noticing whether a step provided for the purpose was in place before undertaking to use it in descending, where its absence was open and apparent, and where he had been in defendant's service for seven years, during a large part of which he was a car inspector.—Leary v. Houghton County Traction Co., 171 Mich. 365.

¶ 1783. A train dispatcher authorized a conductor of one train to leave a part of a broken train on a main track at Cushman while he went back on a branch track to get the rest of the train. The broken train was so left at night, and without lights. The dispatcher then ordered the plaintiff, an engineer, to run his train down the main track with no other warning than to look out for trains switching at Cushman. Plaintiff going at a slow rate ran into the broken train and was injured. Held, that he was not as a matter of law guilty of contributory negligence.—Dugan v. Boyne City, G. & A. R. Co., 158 Mich. 450.

¶ 1784. An experienced railroad freight engineer who has knowledge that a passenger train has the right of way over all other trains, and, in violation of a rule which requires engineers to place their trains on sidings five minutes before the train passes, or if that is impracticable, to send a flagman ahead, deliberately starts his train from a siding within six minutes of the time the passenger train is due to pass a point a short distance ahead and starts to run through a reverse curve a third of a mile long without sending the brakeman ahead, as a result of which a collision occurs in the curve, is guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.—Holmberg v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 188 Mich. 605.

¶ 1785. The comparative negligence of a motorman who was injured in a collision between two interurban cars, and of the defendant railway company, held a question for the jury in an action under Act No. 104, Pub. Acts 1909, §§ 4110-4116, How. St., 2nd Ed.—Darling v. Grand Rapids, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 184 Mich. 607.

Instructions in actions under Federal Employers' Liability Act, see post § 72.

¶ 1786. In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act against an express company for damages on account of the death of an express messenger resulting from a fall sustained by such messenger when he stepped out from his express car under the misapprehension that a baggage truck was in position beside the car so that he could step upon it, held that defendant's liability was a question for the jury.—Chapman v. United States Exp. Co., 192 Mich. 654.

¶ 1787. In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act by a section foreman of the defendant railroad company to recover damages for injuries sustained in a collision between a hand car operated by plaintiff and a similar car operated by another section foreman of defendant, whether the accident happened wholly or partially because of the negligence of the plaintiff in stopping his own car too suddenly, held a question of fact for the jury.—Miller v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 196 Mich. 297.

¶ 1788. Where the evidence is conflicting as to whether the cause of the death of a switchman was his own failure or that of a conductor of the crew to throw a switch, the question is one for the jury in an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.—Walsh v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 185 Mich. 177.

¶ 1789. Where a switchman was killed by reason of the failure of the conductor in charge of a switching crew, to throw a switch as it was his duty to do, in order to divert a string of cars from the track on which the deceased was walking in the nighttime, it cannot be said in an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, as a matter of law, that the negligence of the conductor was not the proximate cause of the death of plaintiff's intestate.—Walsh v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 185 Mich. 177.

¶ 1790. The foreman in charge of car repairing in a railroad yard, who was the only person having control of the key to the switch leading to the repair track, cannot be said as a matter of law to be free from negligence so as to relieve his employer from liability under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (Act April 22, 1908, 35 U. S. Stat. 65), for the death of a car repairer killed by the shunting on the repair track of a car against the one on which he was working under orders from the foreman, who, without warning the latter of his danger, subsequently opened the switch, as he intended doing when he gave the deceased order to work on such car, so as to permit the shifting of cars on the repair track.—Evans v. Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 181 Mich. 413.

¶ 1791. In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act to recover damages for injuries sustained while plaintiff with other employees of defendant was unloading certain heavy timbers, one of which, without warning, shot out of the car and struck plaintiff, whether plaintiff under the circumstances assumed the risk, held for the jury.—Chapman v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 196 Mich. 671.

¶ 1792. In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act against an express company for damages on account of the death of an express messenger resulting from a fall sustained by him when he stepped out from his express car under the misapprehension that a baggage truck was in such position alongside the car that he could walk out upon it, the contributory negligence of the messenger in stepping back onto the truck cannot be regarded by the court as the proximate cause of the accident so as to prevent plaintiff's case from going to the jury, but ought to be regarded as raising a question of contributory negligence which is to be considered by the jury in diminution of damages in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employee.—Chapman v. United States Exp. Co., 192 Mich. 654.

General law as to directing verdict, see Directing Verdict.

¶ 1793. If an injured employee fails to show any negligence on the part of his employer, a verdict should be directed for the latter.—Lydman v. DeHaas, 185 Mich. 128, 8 N. C. C. A. 649.

¶ 1794. Verdict for defendant should be directed where plaintiff, a boy 16 or 17 years old, had worked with a planing machine for months, until he knew its manner of operation, the position of its cogwheels and the danger therefrom, and was injured by having his hand crushed between the cogwheels while sitting upon the bed of the planer waiting to have it adjusted for wider boards, the action being based on negligence in failing to warn him of the danger.—Berlin v. William B. Mershon & Co., 132 Mich. 183.

¶ 1795. In an action by an employee for injuries resulting from an explosion of varnish, the fact that it contained amyl acetate, which might explode if in sufficient quantity did not establish a circumstance calculated to arouse defendant's apprehension of danger, and the trial judge properly directed a verdict for the defendant.—Siegel v. United Elec. Heating Co., 143 Mich. 484.

¶ 1796. Where plaintiff was engaged to oil dangerous machinery in a cement mill, and was injured in the cogs, and there was evidence that the room was not properly lighted, that the air was cloudy from the dust, and that plaintiff was not properly instructed and warned, held that there was evidence to go to the jury, and a directed verdict for defendant was properly refused.—Higgins v. Peninsular Portland Cement Co., 152 Mich. 390.

¶ 1797. Plaintiff was injured by the fall of rock from the hanging wall of defendant's mine, after working therein as a trammer for thirty days. At the time of injury he was loading rock which had been broken down, shoveling it upon a tram car. Held, the case was ruled by Petaja v. Mining Co., 106 Mich. 463, and that the judge properly directed a verdict for defendant.—Karppinen v. Tamarack Min. Co., 154 Mich. 528.

¶ 1798. Plaintiff employee of defendant company was directed to leave his regular work, and help put a tram car which had jumped the track, back on the rails. He had no experience at this and received no instructions. He employed a crowbar and a ratchet lifting jack. In attempting to pry the car over with the crowbar, the car slipped and plaintiff was injured. Held, it was error to instruct a verdict for defendant on the ground that defendant was not negligent.—Johnson v. Desmond Chemical Co., 156 Mich. 669.

¶ 1799. Plaintiff was injured by a log while employed in loading logs on the carriage of the saw in a sawmill. He introduced evidence to show that the kickers used to catch the logs and then to push them over on the carriage, gave way at the wrong time, and let the log fall on his foot. There was no evidence that the kickers had at any time before failed to work properly and defendant had, therefore, no knowledge of the defects. There was evidence that certain weights attached to a steam valve which controlled the kickers were found immediately after the accident out of their proper place and lying on the ground. Held, there was no evidence going to establish defendant's negligence, and a verdict for defendant should have been directed.—Edwards v. Engadine Lumber Co., 158 Mich. 428.

¶ 1800. Plaintiff's decedent, a brakeman employed by defendant, was killed by a rear-end collision. One Taylor, a brakeman, had been sent back to stop the train behind, and had left torpedoes on the track, which failed to explode. The evidence showed that the torpedoes had been bought of a reputable manufacturer; that similar lots bought through a course of years had worked perfectly; that defendant had kept them in a dry place; and that inspection of such goods was practically impossible. Held, on the question of defendant's negligence in failing to furnish good torpedoes, and to supply a proper inspection, a verdict should have been directed for defendant.—Siegel v. Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 160 Mich. 270.

¶ 1801. Plaintiff was a street car conductor, and was standing on the running board of the car collecting fares, while it was in motion. A section man had left the handles of a wheelbarrow loaded with bricks projecting near the track. Plaintiff in passing along, got entangled therewith and was injured. Held, a verdict was properly directed for defendant on the question whether the defendant had failed to provide a safe place to work.—Wickham v. Detroit United Ry., 160 Mich. 277.

¶ 1802. Defendant contracted to build a concrete cellar wall and employed plaintiff as a mixer. After a day or two of hard rain, plaintiff was directed to remove the curbing used to support the cement. The wall fell and injured plaintiff. Held, the court was in error in directing a verdict for the defendant on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence, since the mere falling of the wall was some evidence that the cement was too green for the removal of the curbing.—Gerstler v. Weinberg, 160 Mich. 267.

¶ 1803. Plaintiff's decedent was employed by defendant to wheel sand to a mixer, and stay on shore as his part of the work in the construction of a dam. Defendant's superintendent ordered the deceased to take a point of leakage the scow ran into some scow and repair a leak which had sprung in the new dam. In the effort to reach the submerged timber braces used in the construction. The scow became unmanageable, got into the swift current of the sluiceway, and deceased was drowned. Defendant gave deceased no instruction as to the duty he directed him to perform. Held, the court was in error in directing a verdict on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence on defendant's part.—Snow v. Escanaba Power Co., 162 Mich. 579.

¶ 1804. Plaintiff had been working as a regular miner in defendant's mine for about three weeks. A blast was exploded in the evening in the raise in which plaintiff was working. Next morning plaintiff's assistant did not appear to timber the roof of the place blasted. Plaintiff was directed to work in another part until noon, when he was directed with another to timber the blasted place. While so engaged, a large quantity of ore fell in from the roof and injured him. Plaintiff knew that ore in small quantities was likely to drop at any time. Held, the questions whether the delay in timbering increased the danger, whether the plaintiff should have known of the increased danger, and whether defendant owed a duty to warn him of the increased danger, should under these facts have been submitted to the jury, and it was error to direct a verdict for the defendant.—Hosking v. Cleveland Iron Mining Co., 163 Mich. 538.

¶ 1805. Complainant's intestate was working with some Italians in setting in place a boiler front. The boiler front was lifted to a perpendicular position and while the intestate and the laborers were attempting to move it forward, the laborers let loose of it, and it fell forward upon the intestate. Held, that though the evidence be sufficient to show that the Italians could not understand the English language, so as to understand the orders given, defendant was not negligent on this ground for employing them to do the work, and a verdict was properly directed for defendant.—Rigge v. Wickes Bros., 165 Mich. 297.

¶ 1806. In an action against a railroad to recover for the death of a section man at a crossing, it was held that there was no evidence indicating that the locomotive whistle was a defective one and that the case should have been taken from the jury because of plaintiff's failure to make a case under the evidence.—Lepard v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 166 Mich. 373.

¶ 1807. Plaintiff employee of defendant mine operator was injured by a mistake of defendant's engineer in hoisting the cage upward instead of lowering the same upon the plaintiff's signal, and sought to recover under Act No. 100, Pub. Acts of 1905, § 3, on the ground that defendant did not employ a competent and trustworthy engineer. The evidence indicated that the engineer in question had had many years' experience in running engines in many different industries; that at the time of his employment by defendant and for some time afterwards defendant's chief officer made careful inquiries as to his competency, and personally watched him closely at his work and found him a man of good habits, reliable and giving no evidence of incompetency; that said engineer worked in the position in question for some eighteen months prior to the accident with entire satisfaction; that defendant's officers frequently rode on the cage without noticing anything amiss in his work; and that no complaint was lodged against him by plaintiff or others. Held, the trial court should have directed a verdict for defendant.—Layzell v. J. H. Somers Coal Co., 168 Mich. 373.

¶ 1808. Complainant operator of an electrical passenger elevator in defendant's hotel was injured by said elevator dropping five floors to the basement. The evidence indicated that four weeks before the accident complainant was shoved up above the limits and against the beams so that he could not get down without the aid of the engineer; that this jarred the safety catch; that this fact was reported to the manager and engineer whose duty it was to look after the elevator; that at that time the safety catch was tied back with a rope and a loop of wire; that later the elevator slid from the dining room floor to the basement, breaking mirrors on each side of the car; and that it slid in like manner on other occasions prior to the accident which happenings were reported to the head clerk. Held, the trial court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence.—Ammer v. Postal, 168 Mich. 405.

¶ 1809. A verdict should not be directed for the defendant in an action for injuries sustained by an employee from the explosion of a boiler, where the evidence tends to show that the boiler had been installed for ten years, and that the defendant had notice of its defective condition and failed to make repairs.—Eberts v. Mt. Clemens Sugar Co., 182 Mich. 449.

¶ 1810. Where a miner was killed by the sudden starting of a skip which he was boarding, and the negligence alleged was the employer's failure to properly maintain and inspect the signaling apparatus, a verdict was properly directed for the defendant, where the testimony failed to show that at the time of the accident the signaling apparatus was out of order or that it failed to work.—Paskvan v. Allouez Min. Co., 187 Mich. 101.

¶ 1811. It was error to direct a verdict for defendant in an action by a carpenter against his employer for damages for personal injuries alleged to be due to the falling of a defective scaffold where the evidence as to defendant's negligence was conflicting.—Tautengan v. Zoller, 201 Mich. 94. (Brooke and Fellows, JJ., dissenting.)

§ 70a. ——For failure to show what caused accident.

Evidence as to cause of accident, see ante § 65b.

Jury questions as to cause of accident, see also ante § 67b.

¶ 1812. A brakeman on a gravel train engaged in building a branch of defendant's road was seen, as the train was starting back down a grade for the purpose of getting a start to go over a hill, to step from the "caboose" to the "plow-car," next thereto, and was found, a moment later, dead on the track, part of the train having passed over him. No one saw him fall from the cars, and no one knew how he was made to fall, or what he was doing when he fell. His cap lay at the foot of a tree plainly visible which was sixteen or eighteen inches from the track, and his body was about sixteen feet beyond the tree. There was testimony that some of the brakes were bent so they would hit trees as the train came up, but the record disclosed no occasion to go to the brakes. Held, that the cause of decedent's fall from the train was purely conjectural, and that a verdict should have been directed for defendant.—Manning v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 105 Mich. 260.

¶ 1813. Where, in an employee's action to recover for injuries from the breaking of a mended saw, there is evidence on defendant's part tending to show that plaintiff was not struck, as he claimed, by a piece of the saw, and that the saw was suitable and safe for the use it was applied to, although this was in conflict, the court properly refuses to direct a verdict for plaintiff.—Lau v. Fletcher, 104 Mich. 295.

¶ 1814. In an action against a railroad company for the death of a brakeman, it appeared that decedent was fatally injured on a dark night while attempting to couple cars at a street crossing; that one of the planks at the crossing between the rails had split off near one end, leaving a space sufficiently wide to admit a man's foot; that decedent's version of the accident, given directly after it occurred, was that "he got caught in the planking between the plank and the rail, and the brake beam pushed him back"; that blood was found on the ground, close to the defect in the planking and at intervals toward where he was found injured; that decedent was picked up about two car lengths from the crossing, and that the space between the rails looked as though a body had been dragged along for that distance. Held, that it was not error to refuse to direct a verdict for defendant on the ground that it was purely conjectural as to whether decedent caught his foot or merely stumbled against the end of the planking.—Knapp v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 114 Mich. 199.

¶ 1815. A directed verdict was sustained in an action for the death of an engineer caused by the derailment of his train where, although plaintiff claimed that the derailment was caused by worn castings, she introduced no testimony to show that such wearing would cause a derailment, while the defendant produced nine experienced experts that such wearing had no tendency to cause a derailment.—Peppett v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 119 Mich. 640.

¶ 1816. Plaintiff's decedent was killed while operating a ripsaw by being struck by a piece of timber thrown back by the saw. There was evidence that these "fly backs" had occurred on this machine before; that the timber flying back on this occasion was ripped part way and then broken off; that the guard and spreader were absent; and that when present these greatly lessened the likelihood and force of "fly backs." Held, on the question whether the defendant's negligence in leaving off the guard and spreader was the legal cause of the accident, the court erred in directing a verdict, as there was evidence to go to the jury.—Van Doorn v. Heap, 160 Mich. 199.

¶ 1817. Where it is a doubtful question whether the negligence of a fellow-servant or the defective condition of a tank supplied by defendant caused an explosion injuring plaintiff employee, it is error to direct a verdict for defendant.—McDonnell v. Central Drug Co., 160 Mich. 455.

¶ 1818. In a suit under the Death Act (Comp. L. 1897, § 10427), the evidence showed that plaintiff's decedent, a switchman in the employ of the defendant, mounted a ladder on the end of defendant's freight car for the purpose of reaching a hand brake near said ladder, in order to stop the car; that after climbing part way up the ladder he gave a sudden and vigorous leap towards the wheel of said brake, and endeavored to grasp same; that he missed said wheel, fell to the ground, and was killed by the car. Plaintiff sought to recover on the theory that the ladder in question was defective; that the decedent after mounting same noticed such defect and fearing that it would give way attempted to leap and seize the brake wheel in order to save himself. There was no direct evidence of the defective condition of the ladder or of the decedent's purpose in grasping for the brake wheel. Held, the trial court erred in failing to direct a verdict at defendant's request on the ground that there was no evidence that the alleged condition of the ladder was the proximate cause of the accident.—Groesbeck v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 167 Mich. 259.

¶ 1819. Some evidence was offered to show that plaintiff's decedent, a brakeman employed by defendant railway, caught his foot while going between cars at a switch and was run over and killed. Plaintiff rested his case upon the claim that decedent caught his foot at the defective blocking at said switch. The evidence did not clearly indicate at what point the decedent caught his foot, and there was at the place a gridiron of holes into any of which he might have stepped and brought about the accident in question, the presence of which holes was necessary for the operation of the split switch in question. Held, the cause of the accident was speculative and a verdict for defendant should have been directed.—Scott v. Boyne City, G. & A. R. Co., 169 Mich. 265. (Moore, C. J., and Bird and Blair, JJ., dissenting.)

§ 70b. ——On ground that the risk was assumed.

Assumption of risks, see ante § 56.
Evidence as to assumption of risks, see ante § 65k.
Jury questions as to assumption of risks, see also ante § 67q.

¶ 1820. An employee's eye was destroyed by a chip of metal flying from a metal planer which he was operating. In an action to recover damages for the injury, based upon the employer's alleged negligence in failing to keep the machine in suitable repair, so that chips should not be thrown from it, it appeared that the plaintiff was a skilled machinist, acquainted with such machines; that he had operated the particular machine for thirteen months; and that he learned of the alleged defect when he commenced work. Plaintiff testified that he used the machine for five months without complaint; that he then explained the matter to the foreman, and asked leave to make some repairs, but was informed that time could not be spared to do so; that he told the general foreman, a few days before the accident, that the machine was not fit to do good work, and was told that it would be fixed as soon as it could be reached in the course of repairs. Held, that the testimony did not support the theory that plaintiff remained at work relying upon his employer's promise that the defect should be remedied, and that, upon his own showing, verdict should have been directed for defendant.—Hayball v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 114 Mich. 135.

¶ 1821. A directed verdict for the defendant was sustained where plaintiff, a young man 19 years old, who had worked for some 3 days in defendant's sawmill, was injured by having his foot come in contact with an unprotected saw under a table, while walking between two tables in assisting another employee in removing plank; it appearing that the fact that the saw was not boxed was open to observation and that plaintiff was aware of the fact.—Mushinski v. Vincent, 135 Mich. 26.

¶ 1822. Verdict for defendant should be directed on the ground that the risk was assumed, in an action for the death of a motorman of an electric railway caused by contact of a defective trolley pole which he with another employee, was removing from the top of a car, with a high tension wire, where it appeared that he was familiar with the system, and knew the location of the wire and that contact with it was dangerous, though he had not been instructed specifically as to the danger in removing the trolley pole or that electricity would arc if a conductor like the trolley pole came in contact with, or within half an inch of, a high tension wire.—Harrison v. Detroit, Y., A. A. & J. Ry. Co., 137 Mich. 78.

¶ 1823. A verdict for defendant cannot be directed upon the ground that if the machine was in proper condition, plaintiff assumed all of the ordinary risks, where the assumption of such risk depended upon the finding of the jury as to instructions given to him.—Clemens v. Gem Fibre Package Co., 153 Mich. 495.

¶ 1824. Where there is a possible phase of the case where the risk is not assumed, the trial judge cannot properly direct a verdict on the ground that such risk was assumed.—De Kallands v. Washtenaw Home Tel. Co., 153 Mich. 25.

¶ 1825. Plaintiff, an employee of an electric lighting company, obtained a promise from defendant's foreman that said foreman would see to it that the electricity was not turned on while plaintiff was engaged in working on certain wires. While plaintiff was engaged in such work some person unknown turned on the current and, as a result, plaintiff was injured, and brings this suit to recover for such injury. Held, that the court below properly directed a verdict for defendant, for the foreman had no authority from defendant to make such promise to plaintiff.—Guest v. Edison Illuminating Co., 150 Mich. 438.

¶ 1826. Plaintiff employee was directed by defendant to leave his regular work, and help put a tram car which had jumped the track, back on the rails. He had no previous experience at this and was given no instructions. He used a crowbar and a ratchet lifting jack. While attempting to pry the car over, the car slipped and plaintiff was injured. Held, it was error to direct a verdict for defendant on the ground that the dangers were obvious and plaintiff assumed them.—Johnson v. Desmond Chemical Co., 156 Mich. 669.

¶ 1827. Plaintiff was a lead glazier. He was instructed by defendant, his employer, to assist the foreman in putting up storm windows in a church, to which work he was wholly unaccustomed. The defendant told a lumber dealer to supply material for a scaffold. Plaintiff and the foreman erected the scaffold of the material supplied, which plaintiff testified was old and unsuited to the purpose. Plaintiff was injured by the falling of the scaffold. Held, the case was one for the jury, and the trial court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant.—Carnell v. Halpin, 159 Mich. 42.

¶ 1828. Plaintiff was a common laborer, employed up to the day of the accident in question in wheeling brick or in other common labor. On this day he was ordered to assist defendant in building a scaffold, under his directions and orders and in his presence. He was ordered by defendant not to use more than three nails in nailing the support of the scaffold, and not to drive them clear up, but to leave sufficient room to get the hammer claw under the heads of the nails, so that they could be easily drawn without splitting the boards. Plaintiff followed such instructions. This was the first scaffold he had ever built; he had no knowledge of how scaffolding should be built to be sufficiently strong; and did this work and went upon the scaffold relying upon the judgment and obeying the orders of defendant, without any knowledge of its weakness. Defendant assured plaintiff the scaffold was strong enough to hold an elephant. In a suit for personal injuries, held, the trial court erred in directing a verdict for defendant on the ground that plaintiff had assumed the risk.—Goda v. Maurer, 162 Mich. 621.

¶ 1829. Plaintiff was employed as a common laborer around defendant's ship yard. He was ordered as one of a gang of men to remove some scaffolding from the hold of a vessel lying in the yard. In removing a hatch-cover to get at the scaffolding, plaintiff and his companion took hold of the rings attached thereto and lifted their end of the hatch before the other men could get hold of the rings on the other end, thereby causing the cover to slip off from the coaming and drop into the hold. Plaintiff being unable to extricate his hand from the ring, was carried to the bottom of the hold and injured. Prior to the accident plaintiff had assisted in removing two other covers. Held, plaintiff assumed the risk, and a verdict was properly directed for defendant.—Cribb v. Great Lakes Engineering Works, 167 Mich. 328.

¶ 1830. A man, experienced as a carpenter, while working in defendant's shop had occasion to use a planing machine nearly every day during a period of three months. He knew that certain adjustments had to be made in planing different woods, and by reason of these adjustments not being made, the planer "kicked back" and injured him. The negligence relied on was the neglect to warn and instruct plaintiff when he was first put to work on the machine. Held, the dangers about the machine were obvious and were discoverable by plaintiff by the use of ordinary care, and a peremptory instruction should have been granted.—Newberry v. Boyne City Tanning Co., 176 Mich. 437.

¶ 1831. A verdict was properly directed for the defendant in an action for the death of a trammer caused by a large loose rock falling down a stope, where the danger was apparent to and had been observed by him. —Lesh v. Tamarack Min. Co., 186 Mich. 399.

¶ 1832. In an action against a government contractor to recover for the death of a carpenter who was in charge of a crew of men in putting up and taking down forms in which concrete was poured, where there was some conflict in the evidence as to whether the form at which deceased was at work when killed was being taken down or was being built higher when the accident occurred, but there was no conflict in the evidence upon the question whether deceased saw or could have seen, in the exercise of ordinary care, just what the situation was, it was the duty of the trial judge to direct a verdict for defendant.—Willis v. Oscar Daniels Co., 200 Mich. 19, 16 N. C. C. A. 510.

Liability for acts of fellow-servants, see ante § 55.

Evidence as to fellow-servants' acts or negligence, see ante §§ 64g, 65j.

Instructions as to acts of fellow-servants and duty to employ competent servants, see post § 71e.

¶ 1833. Plaintiff belonged to a section gang of four men, including the foreman, and, while assisting in loading ties upon a hand car, was injured by some of the ties falling off and breaking his leg. There was no evidence tending to show negligence in the employment of any of the men. Held, that the four men were fellow-servants, and that a verdict was properly directed in defendant's favor.—Timm v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 98 Mich. 226.

¶ 1834. Plaintiff was engaged with other section hands in replacing old ties with new, and a projecting step from a passing caboose struck a tie throwing it against plaintiff and injuring him. The steps projected 15 inches while parts of the engines used projected farther, and the evidence showed that such cabooses had been used four years without accident and that similar ones were in common use on other roads. The tie had been placed too near the track by his fellow-servants. Held, that verdict should have been directed for defendant.—Turner v. Detroit Southern R. Co., 137 Mich. 142.

¶ 1835. In an action for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by a defective brake on a hoisting derrick, verdict for defendant should not be directed on the ground that plaintiff's evidence showed that the injury was not due to the defective brake but to the negligence of the engineer in handling it, where he testified that the brake "gave way" and that he "heard the teeth rubbing against the foot brake," though he also testified on cross-examination that the engineer's taking "his foot off released the brake," since the latter would not require that the testimony first given should be disregarded.—Bernard v. Pittsburg Coal Co., 137 Mich. 279.

¶ 1836. In an action for personal injuries to a crossing tender caused by the alleged negligence of a switchman in leaving a switch unlocked the court should have directed a verdict for the defendant on the ground that the injuries to plaintiff by derailment of a car were caused by the act of a fellow-servant, inasmuch as the duty of keeping the switch locked and fastened when not in use was not an absolute but a delegated duty which was to be performed by the switchman.—Dixon v. Grand Trunk Western R. Co., 147 Mich. 667.

¶ 1837. Plaintiff, a conductor on defendant's electric railway, was injured by a collision with a car ahead. There was evidence that the brakes on the plaintiff's car were in an unsafe condition, and a published rule of the company required the crew on the car ahead, under the circumstances, to torpedo the track, which they failed to do. Held, that in view of the evidence of the unsafe condition of plaintiff's car being the proximate cause of the accident, defendant was not entitled to an instructed verdict on the ground that the negligence of the plaintiff's fellow-servant on the car ahead contributed to the injury.—Welch v. Jackson & B. C. Traction Co., 154 Mich. 399.

¶ 1838. Section 3, Act No. 100, Pub. Acts 1905, provides "that only a competent and trustworthy engineer shall be permitted to operate the cages and hoisting devices in all coal mines in this state." Defendant employed one Patton as a fireman of the hoisting engine. Nine years before Patton had had some experience as an engineer. At various times, in the absence of the engineer, he was accustomed to raise and lower the cages. Plaintiff warned Patton, who was in charge of the engine on the occasion in question, to raise the cage a few feet to enable plaintiff to clean out the sump at the bottom of the shaft. Patton did so. He then left the engine, to discharge some of his noisy duties as fireman. He mistakenly heard a signal, lowered the cage, and plaintiff was injured. Held, on the question of the defendant's failure to provide a competent engineer, as required by the statute, that the court erred in directing a verdict for defendant.—Capeling v. Saginaw Coal Co., 156 Mich. 437.

¶ 1839. The Grand Rapids branch of defendant railroad runs west and joins the main line at White Pigeon. Train No. 551 was scheduled to run west from Grand Rapids to White Pigeon, and thence on the main line west to Elkhart. It was due to arrive at White Pigeon about the same time as an eastbound train, No. 550, on the main line. Defendant's dispatcher informed O'Doud, the conductor, and Bock, the engineer, of No. 551 that No. 550 had been withdrawn. O'Doud understood this simply to mean that it was withdrawn from the branch line; Bock, that it was withdrawn from the main line. Upon approaching White Pigeon, O'Doud inquired of the dispatcher where No. 550 was and was told near Elkhart. He ordered his train out on the main line for the purpose of backing it off on a main siding to await the passing of No. 550. One Allison, a brakeman, rode on the engine of No. 551 for the purpose of flagging No. 550, if necessary. Allison had no experience as a flagman. The trains collided and plaintiff, a brakeman on No. 550, was injured. Held, in a suit for injuries, a verdict was properly directed on the ground that the evidence showed negligence only in the plaintiff's fellow-servants and not in the defendant itself.—White v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 156 Mich. 480.

¶ 1840. Plaintiff was employed in a mine temporarily, in a stope above the fifth level, under the direction of another miner, one Kangas. Leading down into the fifth level were several "mills," or walled openings. One of these openings was used to throw rock down, and miners were forbidden to go down by it. Kangas had been directed to get a new rope for this mill, as the one in use was rotten. Kangas, in disobedience of the rules, sent plaintiff down this mill to get a pail of water from the fifth level. The rope broke and plaintiff was injured. Held, Kangas was a fellow-servant of plaintiff, and a verdict was properly directed for defendant.—Avikainen v. Baltic Min. Co., 160 Mich. 375.

¶ 1841. Plaintiff, a motorman on defendant's line, attempted to board defendant's car and ride it across the street and upon a Y, where it was his duty to relieve the motorman in charge. He was injured by the sudden starting of the car while so attempting to board it. Held, the trial court properly directed a verdict for defendant on the ground that plaintiff and the motorman were fellow-servants.—Howcroft v. Detroit United Ry., 163 Mich. 608.

¶ 1842. In defendant's foundry for casting iron there was at one end of the building a raised platform. Beneath this platform were tracks leading out of the building. Stationed on the platform was an operator assisted by a spotter. The operator's duty was to bring a crane load of the iron over the platform to a point above a chute leading down into the cars on the tracks. When the iron was brought into this position a plunger was employed to strike it so as to break off the pigs from the sow and cause them to fall through the chute into the car. Plaintiff's intestate, an ignorant foreigner, was employed about the track to clear it of sand and ice. While so engaged and while no car was under the chute, the operator brought a load of the iron into position above the chute. One of the pigs was broken off by striking a shield and fell through the chute, killing plaintiff's intestate. Held, the accident was due to the negligence of the operator of the spotter in bringing the load above the chute at that time, and a verdict was properly directed for defendant on the ground that the injury was through the negligence of a fellow-servant.—Barto v. Detroit Iron & Steel Co., 164 Mich. 135.

¶ 1843. In an action by a servant for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the master's negligence where it appears from the undisputed facts that if plaintiff had exercised the ordinary care which men of ordinary prudence usually observe he might have avoided the injury complained of, the court is not in error in directing a verdict for defendant.—Melzer v. Peninsular Car Co., 76 Mich. 94.

¶ 1844. A verdict will not be directed in favor of a master on the ground of contributory negligence of a servant engaged as pressman, and injured by the falling of the upper die of a press used to form stove tops, where the servant's testimony shows that he was performing the work in accordance with the usual custom, when injured, and as he had been instructed by the foreman.—Burnside v. Novelty Mfg. Co., 121 Mich. 115.

¶ 1845. In an action for personal injuries to a boy 15 years old for damages sustained by getting caught in the gearing of a printing press while he was stooping to pick up some sheets which had fallen to the floor, it was proper for the court to direct a verdict for the defendant when the proofs showed that the press was in perfect order, was the one on which the boy had learned, and all of its parts were visible and he admitted his knowledge of the danger of approaching too closely, and that in picking up the sheets he took no account of how close his arm approached to the gearing, and the most ordinary care would have avoided danger. Further, there was grave doubt whether the clothing had been caught in the gearing or by a shaft pin or key.—Van Wyck v. Dickinson, 148 Mich. 418.

¶ 1846. In an action for personal injuries resulting from getting caught in the knives of a jointer where the evidence showed that the accident occurred after the plaintiff had been at work upon the two machines for nearly four weeks and he knew perfectly well how to shift the belt to the movable pulley and thus stop the knives, knew about setting the cogwheel in motion, knew the exact location of the cogwheel and of the revolving knives, and knew these things better than any one else, his carelessness in attempting to clean the accumulated chips and dust from the defective suction pipe of the machine without stopping it contributed to his injury and a verdict was properly directed for the defendant.—Mulholland v. Ideal Mfg. Co., 149 Mich. 126.

¶ 1847. In an action for the wrongful death of one employed as a laborer and oiler caused by his having his clothing caught on a shaft, testimony by his superior that he was oiling machinery which was not within his employment and in a part of the premises where he was not required to be, will not justify a verdict directed for the defendant where a fellow-servant testifies that the oiler's duty was to oil all machinery which in his discretion needed oiling and the superior admitted that he was the only oiler employed by the mill during the daytime.—Barr v. Guelph Patent Cask Co., 129 Mich. 278.

¶ 1847a. In an action against a city for the death of a sewer employee, a verdict should be directed in favor of the city where the evidence shows that the death was caused by the giving way of curbing which was being put in under direction of the deceased, who was responsible for its defects.—Winkleman v. City of Adrian, 151 Mich. 519.

¶ 1848. Plaintiff in discharging his duty in assisting to turn an engine on a turntable was injured. There was evidence that the turntable was too small; that the pilot of the engine projected out over the edge of it; that the lever used in pushing it was very close to the projecting pilot; and that the plaintiff had warned his employer, and had been assured that the defects would be attended to. Plaintiff's foot was caught by the pilot of the engine while he was walking just ahead of it, pushing the lever. Held, that since the evidence disclosed and the plaintiff admitted that the turntable might as easily have been pushed in the other direction so as to make him follow the pilot and be entirely out of danger, a verdict should be directed for defendant.—Conner v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 158 Mich. 688.

¶ 1849. Plaintiff, a conductor, in attempting to uncouple defendant's car found that the uncoupling lever was out of order. To operate same he found it necessary to and did place his arm between the cars. The bolts in the drawhead being defective, the drawhead gave way, and plaintiff's arm was injured. The defects of the bolts were such as not likely to be discovered by one performing plaintiff's duty in the usual way. Held, the trial court properly refused to direct a verdict for defendant on the ground of contributory negligence.—Van Leuvan v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 167 Mich. 355.

¶ 1850. Plaintiff was a trammer in defendant's mine charged with the duty of scratching down the ore from the stope upon the soller at the foot of the stope where it was loaded into cars. He was under orders of a shift boss, whose duty it was to see that the hanging wall of said stopes was safe and who had authority to give orders to plaintiff and other trammers at their work. Plaintiff, after protesting that the hanging wall of a certain stope in which he had been working was not safe, was ordered to go ahead with his work by said boss and was injured by falling rock. He was able to see the condition of said hanging wall and sometimes trammers called in the miners to scale said walls in order to render them safe. Held, the court properly refused to direct a verdict on the ground that plaintiff assumed the risk or was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.—Minkkinen v. Quincy Min. Co., 169 Mich. 279.

¶ 1851. Plaintiff had worked for some time as a sweeper in defendant's factory, and a short time before the accident in question became an oiler. He was called upon by the foreman to adjust the screws in rollers used for crushing carbide, which work was unfamiliar to him and outside his usual duties. The place where the rollers were located was dark. The foreman held a light for him and directed him how to apply the wrench on the set screws. In doing this he reached in among the belts and pulleys, and, the wrench slipping, his arm was caught in the pulley attached to one of the rollers and injured. Plaintiff testified that, from the way the foreman was holding the light, he could not see the belts and pulleys and did not know that they were running. Held, it was error for the trial court to direct a verdict against plaintiff for being guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.—Johnson v. Union Carbide Co., 169 Mich. 651.

¶ 1852. Where a woodworker injured by a sliver flying from a machine which he alleges was not guarded as ordered by the state factory inspector and as required by Pub. Acts 1909, Act 285, § 15, How. St. 2nd Ed., § 4023, bases his right to recover on a violation of a promise to place a hood over the side knives, under evidence that plaintiff had a pair of large eye glasses used to protect eyes that he did not use, that he did not use a board that had been prepared to intercept shaving and that no complaint of injury had been made until after discharge, it is not improper to direct a verdict for defendant, particularly where plaintiff did not request a submission of the issue to the jury.—Gorrey v. W. F. Hurd Co., 177 Mich. 116.

¶ 1853. A brakeman while endeavoring to uncouple two cars found that the coupler would not work. He worked it from the other side and after the cars were separated went between the rails to adjust the defective coupler. Through some misunderstanding of signals the train was backed on him and he was hurt. Held that failure to report the defective car as required by the company's rules was such contributory negligence as would justify a directed verdict for defendant.—Coke v. Michigan Central R. Co., 177 Mich. 260.

¶ 1854. A verdict is properly directed for the defendant, where the cause of an employee's death by his clothing being caught on a revolving shaft it was his duty to repair, while leaning over it to make an adjustment of the gearing, is wholly conjectural, and he might easily have stopped it in order to make the necessary repairs, since he was guilty of contributory negligence.—Cressler v. King Paper Co., 181 Mich. 422.

Instruction in action by servant erroneous as not supported by evidence, see also Instructions ¶ 320.

¶ 1855. In an action by a motorman for personal injuries sustained by his car running away on a slippery track, it was error for the court to instruct the jury that plaintiff was only a motorman without other training or experience or knowledge than what was merely sufficient to start and run a car, and he possessed no mechanical or scientific knowledge, but was an inexperienced young man from the country, where in fact he had been instructed and learned to control all the mechanism of the car, and there was nothing to show that he had not been instructed in the usual manner and for the usual time considered necessary for motormen to run a car alone, had been employed by the company for six months prior to the accident, and all of his instructors had considered him competent, and no complaint was made that the instructors were not themselves competent.—Mayer v. Detroit, Y., A. A. & J. Ry., 142 Mich. 459.

¶ 1856. In an action against an employer for wrongful death of the employee where the defendant claims that the deceased through his own negligence fell from a "bent" of a tramway under construction, and the evidence shows that another "bent" broke and the plaintiff claims it jarred deceased from his place, it is erroneous to instruct that one of the undisputed facts is that the deceased was jarred from his place by the breaking of the other "bent" and that the jury would have to accept the undisputed facts.—Jones v. McMillan, 129 Mich. 86.

¶ 1857. Plaintiff, by going outside his usual duties, and using a certain machine in the factory of defendant, his employer, was injured. Defendant's evidence was that plaintiff, upon starting to use such machine upon his own motion, was warned that it was dangerous. Held, that it was error to instruct the jury that defendant contended that he had forbidden plaintiff to use the machine.—Marklewitz v. Olds Motor Works, 152 Mich. 113.

¶ 1858. In an action wherein a person who had been injured by reason of a collision caused by defendant's teamster sought to charge defendant, there was evidence that at the time of the injury defendant's teamster and another were running their horses. At defendant's request the court charged the jury that if it should find the collision was caused by the wrongful and wanton act of defendant's teamster, which act was beyond the scope of defendant's business, plaintiff could not recover. Held, that as defendant did not request a fuller explanation of the law in regard to what would constitute an act within the scope of the teamster's employment, he could not complain of the court's failure to give such explanation.—Vernon v. Cornwell, 104 Mich. 62.

¶ 1859. In a suit for negligently killing plaintiff's decedent, where the plaintiff contends that the injury resulted from the negligence of the defendant railroad in leaving open a hole in its track scales, into which the decedent stepped, the defendant is entitled to have presented to the jury the theory that decedent did not step into the hole, but caught his foot between the main and the scale track, where there is evidence to support such theory.—Gilbert v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 161 Mich. 73.

¶ 1860. Requested instructions in an action for injuries sustained by a minor placed at work at dangerous machine, held sufficiently covered by and given proper prominence in the general charge.—Great Lakes Laundry Co. v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 184 Mich. 294.

§ 71a. ——On duty and care of master; tools, machinery and appliances.

Nature and extent of master's duty as to tools and appliances, see ante § 46.
Jury questions as to sufficiency of tools and appliances, see ante § 67f.

¶ 1861. Where plaintiff's claim in an action for negligence against an electric light company is that defendant's cable had become rotten, and that defendant had notice thereof, there is no error in refusing defendant's requests to charge as to its liability in case its tower, elevator and cable were properly constructed.—Weiden v. Brush Electric Light Co., 73 Mich. 268.

¶ 1862. In an action for injuries caused to plaintiff by uncovered gear wheels in defendant's factory where plaintiff was employed, it appeared from the uncontradicted evidence that if the gears were uncovered they were dangerous; and the court charged that if the jury should find that plaintiff "understood the increased risk of the gears being uncovered, defendant cannot be held responsible if plaintiff continued his work for any considerable time, knowing the danger, without being induced by his master to believe that a change would be made and without making any complaint, or giving notice of such danger to the master." Held, that the question of defendant's negligence was fairly submitted.—Roux v. Blodgett & Davis Lumber Co., 94 Mich. 607.

¶ 1863. In an action for personal injuries caused by a boiler explosion, an instruction charging that the defendant was liable unless it could clearly show due care and caution in the providing and keeping of the boiler, that it was the defendant's duty first to furnish a safe and suitable boiler and then to keep it in that condition, and that in the use of the boiler defendant was bound to keep within the limits of safety, was error, in that a greater degree of care was thus imposed than the reasonable care required by the law.—Beunk v. Valley City Desk Co., 133 Mich. 440.

¶ 1864. In an action by a motorman for injury due to the slipping of his car on a grade, the court, in instructing as to the duties of the company to make the track safe, mentioned the company's duty to the public and to passengers, along with its duty to the motorman. Held, this was not error, only implying that it owed the same duty to all.—Mayer v. Detroit, Y., A. A. & J. Ry., 152 Mich. 276.

¶ 1865. In an action for injury to a boy claimed to have been employed in hazardous employment in violation of Public Acts 1911, No. 230, an instruction limiting the jury to the negligence relied upon and eliminating questions relating to the sufficiency of safeguards except as to the consideration of existing conditions in determining whether plaintiff's employment was hazardous, is proper.—Radic v. Thomas Jackson & Co., Ltd., 178 Mich. 618.

¶ 1866. In an action by a railroad switchman for damages for personal injuries sustained as the result of being caught between the beam at the front of a switch engine and a post in a fence through which a sidetrack passed into a building, as he jumped off the footboard of the engine to avoid being caught between it and a car ahead, an instruction that the jury would be warranted in finding that it was the duty of the engineer to stop if steam was blowing in his face and obscured his vision for any considerable length of time; that it was defendant's claim that the engineer was exercising due care and was on the lookout for signals and did not see any; that the engine was not being run at a negligent rate of speed, and that if this was the case, it was for the jury to determine whether it was his duty to stop until his vision was cleared, held to be correct.—Sergeant v. Grand Rapids & I. Ry. Co., 198 Mich. 385.

¶ 1867. In an action for injuries to a servant caused by an insufficient tool, the action of the court in retracting a portion of his charge in which he had stated that defendant did not owe the duty of furnishing a reasonably safe tool, but only the duty to use reasonable care to furnish such a tool, was not prejudicial to the defendant where it appeared that it had manufactured the tool itself by one of its servants, so that any negligence of the servant was directly chargeable to it.—Potvin v. West Bay City Shipbuilding Co., 156 Mich. 201.

¶ 1868. In an action for wrongful death of a trammer in a mine who was killed when a trolley wire fell from a defective clamp and struck him, it is error to instruct the jury that the defendant was required to use the "greatest possible care" in maintaining such wire, clamp, connection, etc., in a reasonably safe condition, since ordinary care only is required.—Meola v. Quincy Min. Co., 174 Mich. 305.

¶ 1869. Where plaintiff was injured because of the alleged defects in a saw it is not error to refuse a request to charge that the weight of the evidence was that the saw was in proper condition where the evidence on that question was conflicting.—Le Fleur v. Michigan Alkali Co., 175 Mich. 404.

¶ 1870. An instruction in an action by an employee for injuries sustained through the explosion of a boiler, that his right to recover depended largely on whether the boiler in certain particulars had been permitted to become defective and out of repair, and whether the defendant had notice thereof, or in the exercise of reasonable care and prudence should have discovered and repaired such defect, held not improper in view of other portions of the instruction, and the finding of the jury that the boiler was defective.—Eberts v. Mt. Clemens Sugar Co., 182 Mich. 449.

§ 71b. ——As to safe place to work.

Duty to furnish safe place to work, see ante § 46.

¶ 1871. A charge that the railroad company must furnish a reasonably safe place to work cannot be said to have cured error in another charge consisting in substantially telling the jury that if it allowed its track to get out of repair it would be liable and omitting to charge that it was under the duty of merely exercising reasonable watchfulness and inspection to keep it in safe condition.—Anderson v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 107 Mich. 591.

¶ 1872. Where a mine servant was killed by a top fall while preparing to timber the hanging wall pursuant to orders, and it appeared that the duty of his work included assuring himself of the safety of the hanging wall, the court should have directed the attention of the jury to such facts, in connection with his charge as to the master's duty to furnish the servant with a safe place to work.—Andrews v. Tamarack Min. Co., 114 Mich. 375.

¶ 1873. An instruction that the company would be liable to plaintiff for his injuries if the platform in question was insufficient and unsafe for such general use as the company was putting it to, and was liable to be loosened by explosions in the shaft below, was not objectionable as withdrawing from the jury the question as to whether the accident to plaintiff was one which the company might reasonably have anticipated, when it was given in connection with instructions that the burden was upon plaintiff to show that the platform was not such a one as a reasonably prudent company would, under the circumstances, have erected, and that no presumption of want of reasonable care arose from the fact of the planking being disturbed by the firing of the blast, and that such care would not require the company to build a platform which could not be disturbed by blasts below, unless experience had shown that such blasts would probably disturb such platform.—Smizel v. Odanah Iron Co., 116 Mich. 149.

¶ 1874. The trial judge did not err in instructing the jury that the doctrine of safe place applied to a case in which a lineman was injured by the falling of a pole upon which he was working for defendant corporation, where the evidence would warrant the jury in finding that the pole in question was unsafe and dangerous for the linemen to work upon when it was furnished originally by the defendant and put in by the linemen in constructing the road as part of the permanent plant, that the plaintiff was not in the employ of defendant at the time the pole was put in and knew of no defects in it, and that the usual tests employed by linemen to determine the safe character of a pole would not have notified plaintiff that it was unsafe.—Livingway v. Houghton County St. Ry. Co., 145 Mich. 86.

¶ 1875. Where a mine employee was injured by a piece of rock falling from a hanging wall, instructions held properly to present the law as to recovery where the master fails to provide a safe place to work or gives assurance that it is safe.—Oiva v. Calumet & Hecla Mining Co., 178 Mich. 645.

§ 71c. ——As to tests and inspections.

Duty to make inspection, see ante § 53.

¶ 1876. The court instructed the jury that, if it should believe from the evidence that the engine was overhauled and inspected, and subjected to the hydrostatic test, by competent men, within two years from the time of the explosion, and also thoroughly and carefully tested by the hammer test, by competent testers, within thirty days of the explosion,—it appearing from the testimony that those ways of testing had been adopted by railway companies as the best tests they could give,—then defendant had done all that it could be asked to do, and was not guilty of the negligence charged. Held, that this instruction defined what would, as a matter of law, be a reasonable inspection, and what would constitute a reasonable time, and that it operated to remove all ground for an objection that earlier parts of the charge were not sufficiently definite in these particulars.—Woods v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., 108 Mich. 396.

¶ 1877. An instruction requiring a master to inspect a machine as often as was reasonably necessary, in order to ascertain whether it was in proper repair and adjustment, or needed repairs, and imposing the duty to inspect a greater number of times where the circumstances showed much use of the machine, and placing the duty of inspection upon a consideration of the circumstances, held to properly submit the question to the jury.—Burnside v. Novelty Mfg. Co., 121 Mich. 115.

¶ 1878. In a suit to recover for the death of plaintiff's intestate, it is improper for the trial court to instruct as to the duty of defendant railway to inspect its cars, where the plaintiff in her declaration and according to her repeated statements at the trial does not claim any negligence on account of want of inspection.—Groesbeck v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 167 Mich. 259.

¶ 1879. In a suit for injuries to an employee in a drug store from the explosion of a soda fountain tank, there was evidence that the tank in question was an appliance of the simplest character; that it was old, badly rusted and scaled; and that it was in use in a place and under circumstances highly conducive to rust and deterioration, evidence of the existence of which was plainly visible. The trial judge charged that defendant was called upon, in making an inspection of this tank, to do what a reasonable man of ordinary prudence would do to keep it in a reasonably safe condition. There was no testimony showing what inspection was usual or customary as to such apparatus. Held, the charge was not erroneous as permitting the jury to establish a rule of inspection for themselves, where the negligence charged in the declaration was not the failure to inspect, but the failure to furnish sound and safe tanks, since the instruction was intended to bear on that duty.—McDonnell v. Central Drug Co., 170 Mich. 291.

¶ 1880. An instruction imposing a duty upon an electric railroad company to inspect the poles supporting its trolley wires is erroneous, in an action by a lineman to recover for injuries sustained by the breaking of such a pole, where there is evidence tending to show that he assumed the risk of such failure of inspection.—Lynch v. Saginaw Valley Traction Co., 153 Mich. 174.

¶ 1881. Where a miner was injured by a fall of rock and it appeared that blasts were made every day that had a tendency to dislodge rock, a request for a charge based upon the assumption that if an adequate inspection was made two weeks before the accident, defendant would be relieved from liability, is properly refused, the court charging the jury fully as to the degree of inspection which would relieve defendant from liability.—Moilanen v. Washington Iron Co., 176 Mich. 505.

§ 71d. ——As to methods of work, rules, warnings and instructions.

Methods of work, rules and orders, see ante § 52.

Duty of master to warn and instruct, see ante § 54.

¶ 1882. An instruction on the abrogation by common consent and practice of a rule requiring that couplings of cars without automatic couplers should be made with a stick to guide the link is erroneous if it ignores the requisite that the custom of the servants should have been so universal and notorious that the master is presumed to have known of it.—Nichols v. Chicago & W. M. Ry. Co., 125 Mich. 394.

¶ 1883. An instruction, in an action for the death of a brakeman, to the effect that recovery by the plaintiff would not be prevented if the cars were moving so slowly that it was not negligence to pass between them to uncouple them, and that such was the usual custom of brakemen under like circumstances, is erroneous as not submitting to the jury the theory that the railway company had sanctioned a violation of a rule prohibiting an employee from going between cars to uncouple them when in motion.—Fluhrer v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 121 Mich. 212.

¶ 1884. An instruction, in an action for injuries to a tunnel worker due to mismanaged air pressure in building a tunnel, on the Canadian side of a river, which instruction states that compressed air is a dangerous agency, with the dangers not apparent to ordinary men, and that the employer did not afford, either by the system which it adopted, or the valve which it used, or by adopting proper rules and giving proper warnings, any knowledge or warning of the danger which the employee was to encounter, is erroneous, as, under the law of England which applies, the master is not an insurer of the safety of its machinery and appliances and of the system adopted, but such master discharges his duty by appointing competent superintendents and workmen and authorizing them to procure all necessary machinery and appliances, where he does not personally superintend the work.—Turner v. St. Clair Tunnel Co., 121 Mich. 616.

¶ 1885. In an action for personal injuries sustained by an employee in a smelting factory through the explosion of molten matter which the employee was dumping, an instruction stating that it was not enough to tell the employee that the work was dangerous and that if the danger was one that was or should have been known to the defendant, it was its duty to warn the employee and explain to him "the nature, force and probable effect" of such an explosion, was not erroneous as imposing upon the defendant the duty of foretelling the precise result of any possible explosion.—Ribich v. Lake Superior Smelting Co., 123 Mich. 401.

¶ 1886. In an action for injuries caused by a chip flying from a hammer which plaintiff, a boy 17 years of age, was using, an instruction that if a boy of his age would not appreciate the danger of using such hammer it was the duty of the master to instruct, but if the danger was one which a boy of his class would naturally apprehend then it was a risk which was assumed, is sufficiently favorable to the plaintiff.—Dompier v. Lewis, 131 Mich. 144.

¶ 1887. Plaintiff was injured by going outside his usual duties, and operating a dangerous machine of the defendant, his employer. Held, that it was proper for the court to charge that defendant owed the duty to instruct the plaintiff as to its dangers and mode of operation, and the degree of instruction due depended on the age and experience of plaintiff.—Marklewitz v. Olds Motor Works, 152 Mich. 113.

¶ 1888. Instructions to the effect that defendant would not be liable for an injury received by an employee operating a stamping press if the press was in good order, and had been properly inspected, are properly modified by including the element of necessity that the employee should have received sufficient instruction or warning.—Clemens v. Gem Fibre Package Co., 153 Mich. 496.

¶ 1889. On an issue as to whether appropriate instructions were given to a servant, evidence showing that such instructions were given with respect to one matter, does not preclude the court from charging that no instructions were given with respect to the duty in the discharge of which the servant was injured, where the instructions given did not relate to that duty, but solely to the ordinary duties of the servant.—Dalm v. Bryant Paper Co., 157 Mich. 550.

¶ 1890. It is error to instruct that a foreman having charge of a gang of men in the repairing of a line of wires used to transmit electric power, is a vice principal, and is bound in the absence of special agreement, to inform a lineman as to what wires are dangerous.—Argersinger v. Commonwealth Power Co., 164 Mich. 282.

¶ 1891. Where a servant was injured by flying molten metal, due to the presence of water in the ladle with which he dipped said metal, the trial court on the question of the master's duty to warn of said danger instructed that it was not essential to warn a man of danger which in the nature of things he "must appreciate." Held, the language "must appreciate" was not prejudicial to the defendant when taken with other instructions setting forth the true rule.—Borkowski v. American Radiator Co., 165 Mich. 266.

¶ 1892. In a case for personal injuries through falling rock, a charge that it was customary to examine the cliff in close proximity to the blast and to warn workmen of danger, approved.—Druck v. Antrim Lime Co., 177 Mich. 364.

§ 71e. Acts of fellow-servants and duty to employ competent servants.

Liability for acts of fellow-servants, see ante § 55.

Directing verdict on ground of fellow-servants' negligence, see ante § 70c.

¶ 1893. Where the proximate cause of the injury complained of was either the negligence of a superior servant of defendant in ordering plaintiff to continue his work upon a detached car while an engine was approaching, or the failure of the engineer or fireman (plaintiff's fellow-servants) to ring the engine bell, and thus give plaintiff sufficient warning to enable him to save himself from being thrown from the car by the shock of the collision, it is error to refuse to submit special questions to the jury calling for findings whether such warning would have been given, and whether the accident would have happened if the bell had been so rung, for defendant would not be liable for the negligence of the engineer or fireman.—Harrison v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 79 Mich. 409.

¶ 1894. Where a foundry employee, struck and injured by a car used to haul coal and iron up an incline, brought suit against his employer, alleging that the wire cable by which the car was hoisted and lowered had become weak and unsafe, so that, by reason of a slight jerk, it broke, allowing the car to run back, and where upon the trial the engineer, who was responsible for lowering the car, testified that the cable merely became detached, and that he did not discover the fact until too late, defendant was entitled to have the jury instructed that if they should find that the cable was in a reasonably safe and proper condition for use, and that the accident was occasioned by the engineer's negligence in not seeing that the cable was attached, verdict should be for defendant, and a general instruction that the engineer was a fellow-servant of plaintiff, for whose negligence there could be no recovery, was insufficient, especially in view of the fact that plaintiff's theory of the case was fully presented.—Hennig v. Globe Foundry Co., 112 Mich. 616.

¶ 1895. A requested instruction, in an action for the death of a brakeman, killed while going between cars to uncouple them, because of his foot catching in a defective crossing, which states that the railroad company had fulfilled its duty by furnishing the section foreman with material to repair the crossing, and that such foreman's failure to repair was the act of a fellow-servant, ignores the element of the existence of the defect for so long a time that the defendant must be presumed to have notice of it.—Fluhrer v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 121 Mich. 212.

¶ 1896. In an action by a section man for injuries sustained while unloading rails from a moving train which was in charge of an assistant roadmaster, where plaintiff claimed that such roadmaster was a vice principal and not a fellow-servant, and where there was testimony which made it possible for the jury to find that the accident was not due to the negligence of such assistant roadmaster but that it was ascribable to the engineer who was a fellow-servant, it was error to exclude such possibility from the charge, although the jury were told that plaintiff could not recover if he or his fellow-servants were guilty of negligence contributing to the injury.—LaBarre v. Grand Trunk W. Ry. Co., 133 Mich. 192.

¶ 1897. Where a municipal laborer calking water pipes in a trench is injured by the bank caving in, defendant's instruction that if an employee instructed to watch did not give warning it is the negligence of a fellow-servant, may be refused where such phase of the case was fully covered in the charge given.—Keenan v. City of Mt. Pleasant, 176 Mich. 620.

¶ 1897a. In an action by a miner injured while at work in the bottom of a shaft by the fall of a piece of timber in the staging above him upon which timbermen were engaged in timbering the walls of the shaft, an instruction on the relation of plaintiff and the timbermen as fellow-servants held to be correct.—Kaaro v. Ahmeek Mining Co., 178 Mich. 661.

¶ 1898. It was error to instruct the jury that it might fully consider the other claims of negligence in determining the question whether the defendant retained in its employ an incompetent motorman whose negligence caused the accident, in an action by a servant against an electric railway company for injuries for being struck by a car operated by an incompetent motorman, where the only ground upon which plaintiff could recover was the negligence of defendant in retaining such incompetent servant in its employ with knowledge of his incompetence.—Trend v. Detroit United Ry., 149 Mich. 338.

¶ 1899. Where in a suit for personal injury the plaintiff seeks to recover on the theory that defendant did not employ competent men in the construction of a platform, the case should not be submitted to the jury on that theory in the absence of sufficient evidence of such incompetency.—Risku v. Iron Cliffs Co., 163 Mich. 523.

¶ 1900. On action against a railway company by a brakeman injured when an engine backed into a car on which he was preparing the coupling, at a signal by the conductor without his knowledge, where the declaration charges that the accident was caused by the incompetency of the conductor because of the habitual use of intoxicants as a beverage, of which the company had knowledge, and the case goes to the jury on the theory that recovery depends on whether the conductor's judgment and alertness of mind was impaired by the use of intoxicants on that day, a requested instruction should have been given which states that unless it is found that the conductor was incompetent to perform his duties because of the use of intoxicating liquors, of which the company had knowledge, the company was not negligent in keeping the conductor in its employ.—Wallin v. Arcadia & B. River Ry. Co., 172 Mich. 466.

Doctrine of assumption of risk, see ante § 56.
Directing verdict on ground that risk assumed, see ante § 70b.

¶ 1901. The jury should be charged as matter of law that the servant must have known the danger of wiping off the surface of rolls in a rolling mill on the in-drawing side, though not warned thereof by his foreman, where at the time he went to do such work at the foreman's direction he had worked about such machine for some months and had seen it at work rolling out brass bars into sheets, so that its dangerous character was obvious.—Kean v. Detroit Copper & Brass Rolling Mills, 66 Mich. 277.

¶ 1902. It is error to charge on assumption of risk, where the danger came from the breaking of a wire cable either because it was old and weak or because it was unduly strained, of neither of which the employee had any notice.—Piette v. Bavarian Brewing Co., 91 Mich. 605.

¶ 1903. An instruction is proper which states that it is not negligence for a railroad company to build or permit the erection and maintenance of coal bins in close proximity to sidings, and that one who enters the employment of such a company must expect to find coal bins and other structures and that he assumes the risk incident to railroading in such places, in the night as well as the day, and the first time over the road as well as on subsequent trips.—Pahlan v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co., 122 Mich. 232.

¶ 1904. Where a motorman was injured by the slipping of his car on a grade, due to the failure of the company to supply sand, it is proper to instruct the jury that if the plaintiff, after communicating his fears of danger, was assured by the superintendent that the track was safe, the risk was not assumed by the plaintiff.—Mayer v. Detroit, Y., A. A. & J. Ry., 152 Mich. 276.

¶ 1905. Plaintiff, a motorman, was injured by the sliding of his car, due to the failure of the company to supply sand for the tracks. The court instructed that if plaintiff communicated his fears, and the superintendent assured him the track was safe without sand, the plaintiff did not assume the risk. Held, that this instruction did not leave an inference that the negligence of the defendant was to be presumed from the mere fact of the car slipping.—Mayer v. Detroit, Y., A. A. & J. Ry., 152 Mich. 276.

¶ 1906. Plaintiff, a conductor on defendant's electric car, was injured by a collision with a car ahead, and sued to recover for defendant's negligence in having the car brakes in an unsafe condition. Held, that an instruction by the court that plaintiff could not recover if he knew of the unsafe condition, or if he should, with reasonable care, have known of it, was sufficiently favorable to defendant on the question of assumed risk.—Welch v. Jackson & B. C. Traction Co., 154 Mich. 399.

¶ 1907. Combining the defenses of assumption of risk and contributory negligence in instructions is harmless, where the defenses rest upon the same facts.—Burgess v. Humphrey Bookcase Co., 156 Mich. 345.

¶ 1908. At the close of the charge a defendant complained to the court that the question of assumed risk had not been adequately covered. Defendant made no formal request for a further charge. The instruction of the court as given was correct as far as it went. Held, no error was committed.—MacDonald v. Freeman Mfg. Co., 160 Mich. 380.

¶ 1909. Where a requested instruction on the point of assumed risk is incorrect on that point, and properly refused by the trial court, no error arises from the fact that such instruction would have been proper had it been offered on the point of contributory negligence.—Molyneaux v. Bradley, Miller & Co., 167 Mich. 278.

¶ 1910. In an action for injuries under Act 104, Pub. Acts 1909, How. St. 2nd Ed., § 4110, relating to the liability of common carrier railroads to employees for their negligence or that of their officers, agents or employees, it is not error to charge upon the question of assumed risk as would have been proper before the act, where a later correct charge is given and taken together the charge is proper.—Quick v. Detroit & M. R. Co., 175 Mich. 676.

¶ 1911. Where a trammer in a mine was killed by a falling trolley wire, an instruction to the effect that if deceased knew or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known of the defect it was his duty under the rules to have pushed the cars past the defect by hand, and if being chargeable with such knowledge he used the electric power he assumed the risk of such use, should be given, where there is evidence on which to base it.—Meola v. Quincy Min. Co., 174 Mich. 305.

¶ 1912. In an action by a miner injured while at work in the bottom of a shaft by the fall of a piece of timber from a staging above him upon which timbermen were engaged in timbering the walls of a shaft, an instruction upon plaintiff's assumption of risk taken in connection with the entire charge held not erroneous.—Kaaro v. Ahmeek Mining Co., 178 Mich. 661.

¶ 1913. An instruction that the master is liable where he exposes an inexperienced ises, were bound to use the same ordinary care against accidents to themselves as was incumbent on the company, and that if the neglect of plaintiff or of H. in the course of their work under the contract contributed proximately to the accident, plaintiff could not recover, unless the conduct of the company's servants was wanton or wilful. 2. That if H., in the course of his work under the contract, placed the plank on the track, and thereby the cars were thrown off and ran against the woodshed, this was neglect on H.'s part which contributed proximately to the accident, and that plaintiff could not recover unless the conduct of the company's servants was wanton or wilful. There was no evidence that plaintiff knew of the plank, but it was proved to have been seen there by the station agent. Upon the question whether this charge should have been given, the court was equally divided.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Leahey, 10 Mich. 193.

¶ 1919. A railroad company is liable for injuries received by a section hand on its railroad, while working on a flat car under the supervision of its assistant roadmaster, by being knocked off by an engine backing against the car, if, as the engine was backing down he was ordered by his superior, who knew of the approach of the engine, to continue work; hence in an action involving such facts, the jury should be instructed that if the approach of the engine was not known to the superior but was known to plaintiff when the order was given, the latter was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to notify his superior and to secure himself.—Harrison v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 79 Mich. 409.

¶ 1920. In an action for injury from negligence it is error to refuse an instruction that plaintiff cannot recover if his own negligence caused or contributed to the injury, where the evidence tended to show that plaintiff, working on a runway unloading coal, left his wheelbarrow so that machinery caught it and thereby lifted the runway, which fell when released and broke the supporting pieces.—Brown v. Gilchrist, 80 Mich. 56.

¶ 1921. In an action for personal injuries to an infant where the declaration alleges that he is a youth of ordinary intelligence and there was no claim to the contrary, it is not erroneous to instruct that the standard of care required of the plaintiff was that of a boy of ordinary intelligence.—Jahrmatter v. Kline, 129 Mich. 154.

¶ 1922. It is proper to instruct that it is a question for the jury as to whether, if the plaintiff was directed by the defendant to operate the machine by which he was injured, but was not instructed about its use, he knew enough about the machine to apprehend the danger, or whether the danger was obvious to a boy of his age and experience, and if it was, that his own negligence would be a bar to recovery.—Marklewitz v. Olds Motor Works, 152 Mich. 113.

¶ 1923. A plaintiff aged fourteen, sued to recover for injury to his hand in the planing mill of defendant, his employer. The court refused to charge that plaintiff could not recover if guilty of contributory negligence, "even though slight." Held, the refusal to use the words "even though slight" was not reversible error, where the court did charge that plaintiff could not recover if guilty of any contributory negligence.—Lund v. Sargent Mfg. Co., 158 Mich. 3.

¶ 1924. Where a plaintiff brakeman, while standing on the top of defendant's moving freight car in discharge of his duty, is injured through contact with telephone wires strung above defendant's track, the charge of the court that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence if he did not know at the time of the accident of the presence of the wires, is not erroneous where connected with other instructions to the effect that plaintiff was barred from recovery if he previously knew, or by reasonable care should have known, of the presence of the wires.—Meyers v. Detroit & C. R. Co., 166 Mich. 403.

¶ 1925. A railway company is not prejudiced by a charge in an action for injuries which allows the jury to consider that plaintiff, a brakeman, knew that a special freight train might be sent out after his train, and whether such brakeman should have protected the rear of his train at a station, though the rules do not vest any discretion in the trainmen, but require certain precautions under specified conditions.—Fernette v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 175 Mich. 653.

¶ 1926. In an action for injury to a boy claimed to have been employed in a hazardous employment in violation of Pub. Acts 1911, No. 230, an instruction, considered with other instructions given, was held not to be erroneous as requiring the jury to find that defendant had established that there was absolutely no chance for injury anywhere in the locality in which plaintiff was employed, and that his recovery was not barred unless he was grossly reckless and careless, as a condition to a finding for defendant.—Radic v. Thomas Jackson & Co., Ltd., 178 Mich. 618.

¶ 1927. A requested instruction that if a servant has been instructed as to the use of a saw, and fails to obey such instructions, he is guilty of contributory negligence, held erroneously refused where supported by evidence.—Welling v. Kalamazoo Lumber Co., 177 Mich. 340.

¶ 1928. Where a brakeman is injured while attempting to couple by hand cars the couplings of which are of different heights, it is error for the court on the question of contributory negligence to instruct the jury that they are to consider only the care exercised by the plaintiff after he went between the cars, and not that exercised by him in deciding to attempt the coupling at all under the circumstances.—Betterly v. Boyne City, G. & A. R. Co., 158 Mich. 385.

¶ 1929. Plaintiff's intestate, a motorman on defendant's car, was killed in a collision at a railroad crossing. The negligence charged was defendant's failure to provide a brake as required by statute. The court charged that if the brake on the car was deficient and plaintiff did not know its condition, he had a right to assume that it was in its ordinary condition and that the car could be stopped within a reasonable time. Held, such instruction was proper.—Rivers v. Bay City Traction & Electric Co., 164 Mich. 696.

¶ 1930. In an action by a miner injured while working in the bottom of a shaft by the fall of a piece of timber, instructions relating to plaintiff's contributory negligence were held to be correct.—Kaaro v. Ahmeek Mining Co., 178 Mich. 661.

¶ 1931. Under an allegation that a minor's hand was injured by the knives of a dangerous machine, at which he was placed without instructions, in violation of section 11, Act No. 285, Pub. Acts 1909 (How. St., 2nd Ed., § 4019), a charge that he could not recover if, under the circumstances, he failed to use the care and prudence of an ordinary man, and put his hand in the machine without calling the attention of anybody to the matter, or without instructions from any one to do so, unless he thought it necessary in the performance of his duties, was properly given.—Powell v. E. H. Stafford Mfg. Co., 183 Mich. 1.

¶ 1932. An instruction as to the contributory negligence of a child employed at a dangerous machine in violation of Act No. 285, Pub. Acts 1909, as amended by Act No. 220, Pub. Acts 1911, §§ 4009-4063, How. St., 2nd Ed., held not prejudicial to the defendant.—Schuetz v. Van Orman, 184 Mich. 478.

¶ 1933. Plaintiff, a miner, was injured by the falling of a rock from the roof of a drift of the mine. He introduced evidence that it was the custom, not always observed, for the mine boss, after exploding a charge of dynamite in the drift for blasting purposes, to go into the drift ahead of the miners to inspect the condition of the roof and walls. On the occasion in question plaintiff did not wait to be told by the boss that the place was safe, but went ahead and began his work. The court instructed the jury that if plaintiff knew it was the duty of the boss after blasting to go ahead of the men and inspect, to see if the drift was safe, and if plaintiff did not wait for him to do so, plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and could not re-

¶ 1938. An instruction in an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, for the death of a switchman, held to properly submit to the jury the question of contributory negligence.—Walsh v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 185 Mich. 177.

¶ 1939. An instruction as to the reduction of damages in an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, because of the contributory negligence of the injured servant, approved.—Walsh v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 185 Mich. 177.

¶ 1940. An instruction as to the measure of damages and as to negligence and as to burden of proof as to contributory negligence in an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act which ignored the fact that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law according to his own testimony, held erroneous.—Holmberg v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 188 Mich. 605. (Brooke, C. J., and Ostrander, J., dissenting.)

¶ 1941. In an action by a railroad employee under the Federal Employers' Liability Act to recover damages for personal injuries, where the plaintiff claimed he was injured while he was attempting to get upon defendant's car after it had stopped by reason of it being suddenly started by defendant, and defendant claimed plaintiff attempted to board a moving car, and the court charged that under such claims and the evidence if defendant's claim was right plaintiff could recover nothing and if plaintiff's claim was right he could recover all the damages sustained, and in effect that no question of contributory negligence was involved, held that the question whether plaintiff attempted to board a moving car was submitted to the jury, and there was no reversible error in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff.—Cholerton v. Detroit, J. & C. Ry., 199 Mich. 647.

¶ 1942. In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act against a railroad company to recover damages for injuries sustained by a section foreman while operating a hand car from a collision with another hand car operated by another section foreman, by reason of alleged defective brakes on the latter car, an instruction that defendant was not bound to keep its car in such condition that an accident would never happen or absolutely safe but only in such condition that an accident would ordinarily not be apt to happen in the ordinary reasonable use of the car, in which case defendant would not be negligent if an accident did happen, held to state the proper rule as to plaintiff's assumption of risk.—Miller v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 196 Mich. 297.

¶ 1945. A master is liable to third persons for the negligence of a servant while acting as such and within the scope of his employment.—Cook v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 189 Mich. 456.

¶ 1946. A master is responsible for the trespasses of his servants, done under the directions of an overseer, or in the regular course of their employment, and not by wilful wrong. He must keep them within their proper bounds. For wilful misconduct he is sometimes liable and sometimes not.—Smith v. Webster, 23 Mich. 298.

¶ 1948. The hirer of a horse is liable for its death caused by the acts of his servants in maltreating and punishing the animal to hasten its movements while using it directly in the line of their work.—Pesola v. Forsten, 182 Mich. 94.

¶ 1949. An employer does not necessarily escape liability for injuries resulting from the substitution by his employee of gasoline for kerosene sold to a customer by reason of the fact that the employee believed the gasoline was kerosene after personally inspecting same.—McLawson v. Paragon Refining Co., 198 Mich. 222.

¶ 1953. The doctrine of respondeat superior applies only when the relation of master and servant is shown to exist between the wrongdoer and the person sought to be charged for the result of some neglect or wrong at the time and in respect to the very transaction out of which the injury arises.—Riley v. Roach, 168 Mich. 294.

¶ 1954. Where a trespass is committed by the subordinate employees of a corporation, the doctrine respondeat superior applies to the corporation rather than to its agent in charge.—Bath v. Caton, 37 Mich. 199.

¶ 1955. A master is liable for the negligent driving of a servant, even while the latter is acting temporarily for a third person who has hired the team and its driver from the master; and it is immaterial that the person hiring expressly asked for the services of this particular driver.—Joslin v. Grand Rapids Ice Co., 50 Mich. 516.

¶ 1956. A special deputy sheriff, whose duty it was to preserve order at a resort of a street railway company, and upon the cars going to and from such resort, at the expense of such company, represented not the public, but the company, and the company was liable, in an action for personal injuries, where it appeared that such officer assaulted the plaintiff, at the request of the conductor, for the nonpayment of his fare.—Foster v. Grand Rapids Ry. Co., 140 Mich. 689.

¶ 1956a. The defendant gave one Crawford and one Smith a license to go in upon and clear certain wild land at so much per acre. They had full liberty to decide with reference to the manner, place and amount of clearing. Fires set by Crawford spread onto the plaintiff's land. Held, that as Crawford was an independent contractor, defendant was not liable.—Rogers v. Parker, 159 Mich. 278.

¶ 1957. A servant of one person when loaned another for some special service, with respect to such services becomes the latter's servant, and the borrower is answerable as master for the acts of the servant while so engaged, without any actual contract of employment between them or the servant receiving payment for his services.—Janik v. Ford Motor Co., 180 Mich. 557.

¶ 1958. Where the servant of one person is loaned another, an important consideration, although not controlling, in determining who is answerable for the acts of the servant while engaged in the special service is the ownership of the equipment, appliances or instrumentality with or in relation to which the temporary service, out of which an alleged injury arose, is performed.—Janik v. Ford Motor Co., 180 Mich. 557.

¶ 1959. A servant of an automobile dealer who was, at the request of an out of town purchaser of a car, made after the completion of the sale, loaned to the latter in order to take the car to the limits of a populous city, while so engaged is to be regarded as the servant of the purchaser.—Janik v. Ford Motor Co., 180 Mich. 557.

¶ 1960. A chauffeur, who, at the time of a collision with a pedestrian, is taking an automobile from the residence of the owner to his employer's garage, in pursuance to a contract between the owner and the employer whereby the employer agreed for a specified sum to take care of the car at his garage and call for and deliver it to the owner at any point requested in the city, is the servant of the garage proprietor and not of the owner of the car.—Sweetnam v. Snow, 187 Mich. 414.

¶ 1961. An automobile dealer is not answerable for the negligence of his servant while driving a car to the limits of a populous city at the request of a purchaser, where, after the completion of the sale, the servant was loaned to the buyer, an out of town purchaser, at request, notwithstanding that the car bore the dealer's license tag at the time of an accident.—Janik v. Ford Motor Co., 180 Mich. 557.

¶ 1962. A towerman in charge of an interlocker for two railroads is the employee of both roads, and his negligence is attributable to each.—Van Orman v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 152 Mich. 185.

¶ 1963. A materialman furnishing plans and specifications and reinforcing steel for a reinforced concrete building is an independent contractor.—Bayne v. Everham, 197 Mich. 181.

¶ 1964. Where plaintiff let a team of horses to a person having an independent contract with defendant company to cut and deliver logs, the fact that the overseer of the defendant company gave the driver some suggestions and directions on the question of depositing logs for the purpose of building a road across a frozen lake, does not create the relation of master and servant between such driver and the defendant company so as to make the company liable for the loss of the horses by drowning, when it appears that the independent contractor was managing and controlling the building of the road at the time of the accident.—McBride v. Jerry-Madden Shingle Co., 173 Mich. 248.

¶ 1965. Plaintiff was on the street on his way to defendant's depot for the purpose of taking a train. A police officer of the city attempted to arrest plaintiff, and the undisputed evidence showed that he called to his aid the depot watchman in the employ of defendant. In a suit for personal injuries against defendant, held, said depot watchman was acting in his capacity as a peace officer of the state, and defendant was not liable for his part in the arrest.—Buman v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 168 Mich. 651.

¶ 1967. Acts not fairly or reasonably incident to the nature, character or purpose of the business in which the servant is employed, or not in the discharge of the duties intrusted to him, do not render the master liable.—Wiltse v. State Road Bridge Co., 63 Mich. 639.

¶ 1968. The phrase "in the course of his employment or authority" when used relative to the acts of a servant, means while engaged in the service of his master, or while about his master's business; it is not synonymous with "during the period covered by his employment."—Riley v. Roach, 168 Mich. 294.

¶ 1969. The phrase "in the course or scope of his employment or authority," when used relative to the tortious acts of a servant, means while engaged in the master's service, or while about the master's business.—Brinkman v. Zuckerman, 192 Mich. 624.

¶ 1970. When the wrong done by the servant merely arises from an excess of authority committed in furthering the master's interests, and the master receives the benefit of the act, the master's liability does not depend upon any question of the exact limits of the servant's authority.—Chicago & N. ¶ 1978. For the wanton violation of law by a servant, although when occupied about the business of his employer, the servant alone is liable.—Moore v. Sanborne, 2 Mich. 519.

¶ 1979. For those aggravations that arise out of his servant's wantonness and malice the employer is not on the same footing with his servant.—Great Western Ry. Co. of Canada v. Miller, 19 Mich. 305.

¶ 1980. A master is not responsible for a positive wrong intentionally or recklessly done by his servant, beyond the scope of his business.—Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Bayfield, 37 Mich. 205.

¶ 1981. A master is liable for an injury done by his servant in the course of his employment, where the latter acted carelessly and recklessly and in negligent disregard of his master's instructions, but not if the injury was wanton, wilful and intentional. Recklessness is only a high degree of negligence; the master's responsibility is not affected by the degree.—Cleveland v. Newsom, 45 Mich. 62.

¶ 1982. One who innocently and for a lawful purpose employs another is responsible only for what is fairly within the authority that he gives him, and not for his trespasses; nor is he liable for the latter's aggravated and wanton wrongdoing in such damages as would be proper if he did it himself or sanctioned it.—Sutherland v. Ingalls, 63 Mich. 620.

¶ 1983. In determining the question of liability of a master for the torts of his servant, the line is drawn between those acts negligently or unskilfully performed and those done by the servant in a wanton violation of law.—Ducre v. Sparrow-Kroll Lumber Co., 168 Mich. 49.

¶ 1984. Defendant's store was in charge of one Kroll, as manager, and one Struthers was a clerk therein. Plaintiff came into the store intoxicated and was guilty of improper conduct toward women in the store. He was not there as a customer or by invitation. Struthers ordered him out, put his hand on plaintiff's arm and plaintiff, having become quiet, was standing by a stove when Struthers suddenly attacked him with a hammer, knocking him down. Plaintiff was then put out a side door. Held, Struthers' act was wanton and wilful and defendant was not liable therefor.—Ducre v. Sparrow-Kroll Lumber Co., 168 Mich. 49.

§ 77. ——Acts of chauffeurs and drivers.

Liability for death of hired horse, see ante ¶ 1948.

Liability for negligence of loaned chauffeurs and drivers, see also ante § 74.

Due process in statute imposing liability for another in respect to motor vehicles intrusted to him, see Constitutional Law § 158.

Liability of motor vehicle owner for negligence of driver, see Comp. L. 1915. § 4825.

¶ 1985. Where defendant's chauffeur takes out his automobile without any order from defendant or his wife, his housekeeper, or any member of defendant's family, and without defendant's knowledge or consent, and contrary to his express directions, said chauffeur is acting outside the scope of his authority, and defendant is not liable to third persons for injuries occurring through said chauffeur's negligence, the automobile at the time of the accident being under the direction of guests of defendant.—Riley v. Roach, 168 Mich. 294.

¶ 1986. The owner of an automobile is not liable for damages caused by his chauffeur while driving the machine on a trip of 2½ miles to the home of a relative of such chauffeur and during an interval when the owner did not require the use of his machine, and such trip cannot be said to have any relation to the owner's business.—Brinkman v. Zuckerman, 192 Mich. 624.

¶ 1987. In an action for damages against the owner of an automobile for damage caused to plaintiff's store, where it appeared that, towards the close of the interval when the owner did not require the car, his chauffeur, while returning to the point where he had left the owner, deviated from his route and collided with plaintiff's store, held that the rule making the owner liable for acts of the chauffeur within the scope of his employment, notwithstanding any disobedience of the owner's orders, could not be applied to hold the owner liable.—Brinkman v. Zuckerman, 192 Mich. 624.

¶ 1988. A chauffeur who has borrowed his employer's car for a trip is still using the car for his own purposes where he is on the return trip to the point where the master has designated that he meet him, and the master is not liable for a tort committed by the chauffeur while so returning.—Brinkman v. Zuckerman, 192 Mich. 624.

¶ 1989. Express consent of an automobile owner that a chauffeur may use the owner's car for matters pertaining to the chauffeur's own pleasure amounts to no more than a loan of the car, and does not make the use of the car any part of the owner's business so as to charge him with liability for damage caused by the chauffeur.—Brinkman v. Zuckerman, 192 Mich. 624.

¶ 1990. A driver employed by an automobile manufacturing company who is required to spend his time inspecting, examining and testing machines for his employer at the plant of a manufacturing company where the machines are manufactured for his employer, and who, after working hours, volunteers to take a salesman working for his employer in a machine of such manufacturing company, which had not been delivered to the employer, to one of his employer's plants, is not acting within the course or scope of his employment or authority.—Eberle Brewing Co. v. Briscoe Motor Co., 194 Mich. 140.

¶ 1991. If a chauffeur, or any other servant, commits an injury while doing something relative to his own affairs exclusively and in no wise connected with his master's service, there is no rule of common law holding the master liable, and it ordinarily makes no difference that the injury is inflicted by the use of an instrumentality belonging to the master.—Brinkman v. Zuckerman, 192 Mich. 624.

¶ 1992. An employee of a garage, in acceding to the request of the son of the owner of a car left for repairs for a demonstration of the thoroughness and value of the repairs to a clutch by running the car up and down a hill, is acting within the scope of his employment, although he is not specifically directed to perform such act by his masters. —Slattery v. Tillman, 197 Mich. 349.

¶ 1993. An employer is not liable for personal injuries to a boy riding on a lumber wagon with the consent of the driver who has been expressly forbidden to permit children to ride with him.—Schulwitz v. Delta Lumber Co., 126 Mich. 559.

¶ 1994. The owner of a truck is not liable for personal injuries sustained by a boy who was riding on it by express permission of the driver where the owner has repeatedly warned the driver not to permit boys to ride on the truck and there is no evidence that he knew that his instructions were disobeyed.—Mahler v. Stott, 129 Mich. 614.

¶ 1995. An employer who employs boys to drive his delivery wagons for certain hours each day, and who places the horses in care of a stable keeper, is not liable for an injury caused to a person riding a bicycle through a collision with one of the employer's horses while it was being driven by one of such boys, after hours, at the request of the stable keeper, and for the purpose of exercising the horse; the act of the boy being outside the scope of his authority. —Reaume v. Newcomb, 124 Mich. 137.

¶ 2001. In a suit for damages for injuries claimed to have been received by reason of the careless and reckless driving of defendant's servant, his condition as drunk or sober at or about the time of the accident is a proper subject of inquiry.—Williams v. Edmunds, 75 Mich. 92.

¶ 2002. In an action for damages caused by the recklessness of defendant's servant in leaving his horse unhitched, it is proper for the identification of the turn-out to show that the name of defendant's firm appeared on the vehicle.—Schulte v. Holliday, 54 Mich. 73.

¶ 2003. A servant's long-continued and notorious habit of leaving his master's horse unhitched may be shown in an action against the master for damage caused thereby.—Schulte v. Holliday, 54 Mich. 73.

¶ 2004. Where a person sued for damages caused by the recklessness of a driver in his service defends on the ground that the team belonged to a third person and that the driver was in his employment, it is proper to show that defendant and the third person had been in partnership until shortly before the injury.—Schulte v. Holliday, 54 Mich. 73.

¶ 2005. In an action for injury caused by the conduct of a servant the burden of proof is not on plaintiff, after he has shown that at the time the injury was done the servant was in the employment of defendant in his regular business, to show further that he was acting in the course of his employment.—Schulte v. Holliday, 54 Mich. 73.

¶ 2006. In an action for personal injuries received from the derailing of a roller-coaster owned and operated by a third person in defendant's park, evidence that the car ran over a chip, that carpenters in defendant's employ were at work in buildings near by, and that some chips made by them were found at the place of the injury, would not warrant a jury in finding that the accident was caused by the negligence of defendant's servants in allowing the track to be obstructed.—Knottnerus v. North Park St. R. Co., 93 Mich. 348.

¶ 2007. Where, in an action for an injury from a collision caused by the negligence of defendant's teamster, the latter has testified that he had one or two drinks of whisky on the day of, and prior to, the accident, it cannot be said that the teamster's sobriety at the time of the injury was so beyond dispute as to render immaterial evidence concerning defendant's knowledge of the teamster's habits of intemperance.—Vernon v. Cornwell, 104 Mich. 62.

¶ 2008. The fact that at the time of an accident an automobile bore the license tag of a dealer, does not raise an inference against the ownership and control of the car by a purchaser who was riding therein, although driven by the dealer's servant, who was, at the request of the purchaser, made after the completion of the sale, loaned the purchaser to drive the car to the limits of a populous city, where it appears that dealers' license tags are frequently left on cars after sale, and when being driven away, until the purchaser can obtain a license for himself.—Janik v. Ford Motor Co., 180 Mich. 557.

¶ 2009. Authorization by a corporation of the utterance of a slander by an office manager, or a ratification thereof, held not shown by the evidence.—Flaherty v. Maxwell Motor Co., 187 Mich. 62.

¶ 2010. In an action for personal injuries, where plaintiff had driven an unmanageable horse within five feet of a backing engine from which steam was escaping, he is precluded from recovering although he testifies that he did not see the engine but saw the rest of the train, for he must have known it was being moved by an engine, and it was his duty to have seen both the engine and the cars.—Mahan v. Clee, 87 Mich. 161.

§ 80. ——Questions of law and fact.

In actions for wrongful discharge or wages, see ante §§ 23, 30.

In actions for injuries to servant, see ante § 67.

General law as to jury questions, see Trial, VI.

¶ 2011. Whether the relation of principal and agent or of master and servant exists in any given case is under proper instructions a question of fact for the jury.—Wilkinson v. Detroit Steel & Spring Works, 73 Mich. 405.

¶ 2012. Where there is conflicting evidence as to whether a person in charge of a traction engine at the time a fire complained of was caused was the servant of defendants or of the persons from whom the engine was purchased, the question is for the jury.—Rogers v. Fowler, 151 Mich. 485.

¶ 2013. Defendant's son, while driving a milk wagon, injured plaintiff. While being served with process, defendant was asked whether he owned the milk business. He replied that he did not own it, but had an interest in it. Other testimony showed the father had set the son up in business. Held, it was an open question whether there was evidence of defendant's responsibility as owner, to go to the jury.—May v. Hill, 152 Mich. 158.

¶ 2014. Defendant contracted with Hook and Still to clear certain lands for him. Plaintiff sued defendant for negligently permitting fire to escape from his premises during the course of said work and invade those of the plaintiff. There was evidence that defendant oversaw and directed the work of said Hook and Still; that he told plaintiff he could not depend on said men; and that he requested plaintiff to assist in said work and paid plaintiff for such assistance. Held, the court properly submitted to the jury the question whether said Hook and Still were independent contractors for the purpose of determining defendant's liability.—Ripley v. Priest, 169 Mich. 383.

¶ 2015. Defendant paint company entered into an arrangement with one Boyseau to deliver paint for it. Boyseau was to furnish the horse and wagon, and he was at liberty to drive himself or have his agents do it, and was free to work for other persons besides defendant. While delivering for defendant, he put the defendant's sign on his wagon. In a suit for personal injuries inflicted by Boyseau's wagon, held, he was not defendant's servant, and defendant was entitled to a directed verdict.—Burns v. Michigan Paint Co., 152 Mich. 613.

¶ 2016. In an action for damages caused by defendant's automobile to plaintiff's store where it appeared that towards the close of the interval when the owner of the automobile did not require his car, his chauffeur, who had been driving the car about for his own pleasure, deviated from the direct route while returning to the point where he had left his employer, and collided with the front of plaintiff's store, held a verdict was properly directed for defendant.—Brinkman v. Zuckerman, 192 Mich. 624.

¶ 2017. In an action by a passenger on defendant's launch on account of personal injuries received as a result of the alleged incompetency of the master of such launch, where there was no evidence that defendant had knowledge or notice of the master's incompetency, or of matters sufficient to put him on inquiry, or of any conduct that would have disqualified such master for the work he was doing, held not error to take the question of incompetency from the jury.—Gordon v. Drake, 193 Mich. 64.

¶ 2018. In an action against the owner of an automobile and his son for damages on account of the death of one who was struck by such automobile when driven by the son, held, that a verdict could properly be directed for the owner of the car at the close of plaintiff's case.—Johnston v. Cornelius, 193 Mich. 115.

¶ 2019. In trespass against an employer for an injury caused by the act of his servant, it is for the jury to decide whether the act was wilful or careless; if wilful, the employer would not be answerable.—Wood v. Detroit City St. Ry. Co., 52 Mich. 402.

¶ 2025. In an action of trespass vi et armis for damages caused by defendant's truckmen in removing a piano, an instruction that the defendant employer is liable only for such acts as were committed by the truckmen in doing those things necessary in getting the piano, is sufficiently protective of the defendant's rights.—Canton v. Grinnell, 138 Mich. 590.

¶ 2026. In an action against the owner of a reinforced concrete building, the contractor and a materialman furnishing plans and specifications and reinforcing steel, to recover for the death of a carpenter due to the fall of a portion of the second floor, an instruction that the materialman was an independent contractor held inconsistent with an instruction that it was the duty of the owner to furnish plans and specifications.—Bayne v. Everham, 197 Mich. 181.

¶ 2027. Neither employers nor employees may use force, violence, threats, intimidation or coercion, when disputes arise as to employment of laborers.—Beck v. Railway Teamsters' Protective Union, 118 Mich. 497.

¶ 2028. The law will protect employers in the right to employ whom they please, at prices which they and their employees can agree upon, and to discharge them at the expiration of their term of service, or for violation of their contract, as against interference by a trade union. Laborers have the right to fix a price upon their labor and to refuse to work unless that price is obtained. Laborers also have the right to organize in order to improve their condition and secure better wages, and they may use persuasion to induce men to join their organization or refuse to work except for an established wage.—Beck v. Railway Teamsters' Protective Union, 118 Mich. 497.

¶ 2029. Laborers may present their cause against the master to the public in newspapers or circulars, using no coercion, and if the effect is ruin to the employer, it is damnum absque injuria.—Beck v. Railway Teamsters' Protective Union, 118 Mich. 497.
